Jerusalem: the symbol

By GERALD M. STEINBERG
Special to The CJN

To understand the events taking place in the Middle East today, one must understand the history and symbolic importance of Jerusalem to both Jews and Arabs. However, while the Arab perspective is presented in the media repeatedly and in detail, remarkably few people know about the intense Jewish attachment to this ancient city. The result is a one-sided view, which cannot account for the Israeli insistence on maintaining sovereign control of an undivided city.

The Jewish involvement began 3,000 years ago when King David founded Jerusalem as his capital. For most of the first thousand years, the Holy City was the centre of Jewish life and culture. The First and Second Temples were the focus of religious and political activity for generations, and prophets and other leaders, including Jesus, came to Jerusalem to preach.

Commentary

The destruction of the Second Temple in the year 70 CE marked the end of Jewish sovereignty over Jerusalem, but for the next 2,000 years, Jews prayed for the restoration of Jerusalem three times daily. On Passover, Jews around the world ended their seders with the hope for "next year in Jerusalem."

Throughout the centuries of exile and persecution, Jews trickled steadily back to Jerusalem, always maintaining a presence and often constituting the majority of the city's population.

With the end of Ottoman rule and the establishment of the League of Nations' mandate over Palestine, the ancient Jewish dream of a return to the "city of peace" seemed to have been answered, but this proved

Mimouna without the mangal

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The aroma of charred meat that has permeated the official Mimouna celebrations in the past will be absent this year, according to Shalom Amoyal, chair of Beyahad, the organizer of the event.

The Mimouna, marked on the evening and day following the last day of Pesach, is a Moroccan Jewish tradition. In Morocco, families would open their homes to Jewish and Muslim guests in the evening and then go out to celebrate in nature on the following day.

However, Amoyal said, the mangal, or barbecue grill, is an Israeli development which does not reflect the traditional spirit of the holiday.

He is especially unhappy about media reports which depict Mimouna celebrations as featuring grilling meat or dancing women.

"We wanted to make a revolutionary change," Amoyal said.

Thus, this year, instead of the free-flowing celebration that has been held in the past in Jerusalem's Sacher Park, there was a restrained gathering Tuesday afternoon in Safra Square, adjoining the Jerusalem Municipality, with seats for 3,000 participants and standing room for another 15,000. Booths represented 10 ethnic groups, including Ethiopians, Georgians, Persians and Yemenites.

Encyclopedia Judaica

JERUSALEM — The 26-volume Encyclopedia Judaica is now available on CD-ROM.

The disk, made available last week, contains all 25,000 entries and 15 million words from the original printed version, along with new multimedia tools. It contains more than 100 video clips, as well as music clips of traditional Jewish songs.

Who's Who in Health

JERUSALEM — The first-ever national directory on health and medicine was recently published by a commercial company. The 600-page directory includes listings of a large variety of individuals and organizations in the field, from hospitals and clinics to doctors and health insurance companies.

The guide, which has the support of the Health Ministry, is being published by the Silver Screen company in Tel Aviv.

Drink to Your Health

JERUSALEM — Grapefruit juice was recently suspected by the British press of causing death in rare cases when taken with certain drugs for hypertension, allergies and heart disease. Now, however, it has been found that drinking that juice can have a welcome advantage: it increases the concentration of the anti-rejection drug, cyclosporine, in the blood.

WORLD

Mission: Possible

ATLANTA — Mission: Possible is the theme of the 1997 annual conference of the Association of Jewish Family and Children's Agencies, scheduled for May 4 to 6. This year the conference will coincide with the organization's 25th anniversary. The gathering will bring together over 350 lay and professional leaders in the Jewish human service field from across Canada and the United States.

NIF Deplores Vote

WASHINGTON — The New Israel Fund has deplored the recent measures in Israel that would give official sanction to a rising tide of religious intolerance.

The fund announced an initiative that will reinforce its support for non-governmental organizations in Israel working to promote religious freedom. It will also seek to mobilize American Jewry to influence the Israeli government to resist pressure from those who would delegitimize non-Orthodox forms of Judaism.

Cantors Assembly Jubilee

CHICAGO — New melodies for the prayers and rituals that will shape the role of the modern synagogue in the 21st century will highlight the 50th annual convention of the Cantors Assembly to be held here from May 25 to 29.

Award for Bronfman

NEW YORK — Philanthropist Charles Bronfman received the first ever V'shinantam l'vanechah (Teach Them Faithfully to Your Children) award from the North American Alliance for Jewish Youth (NAA) for his commitment to Israel experience programming for Jewish youth.

He received the award at the NAA's debut conference on Informal Jewish Education. The event was attended by 200 professionals in the field of informal Jewish education from across North America.

Holocaust Memorial

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina's Catholic church recently honored the memory of the victims of the Holocaust and of anti-Semitic terror bombings in Buenos Aires.

In what church officials described as an unheard-of gesture, the Cardinal Primate of Argentina, Antonio Quarracino, unveiled a Holocaust memorial in one of the chapels of the National Cathedral.

EGYPT 'AWASH' IN USSR AID

"A steady stream of Soviet weapons has turned Egypt into one of the world's most formidable anti-aircraft defence zones," according to U.S. News and World Report.

The magazine said more than 15,000 Soviet troops are in Egypt, manning missile sites and instructing Egyptians. It said more than 100 Soviet pilots are in Egypt to protect Russian bases, and some fly the highly advanced MIG-23, a plane rarely seen outside Russia.

UJA DRIVE GOES OVER $5 MILLION MARK

The 1972 United Jewish Appeal-Israel Special Fund campaign total sailed well past the $5 million mark this week as the result of an intensive post-Passover campaign involving all divisions.

Synagogues and organizations have been especially active, many of them holding special UJA fundraising functions.

About 50 percent of last year's contributors have already pledged for 1972, many with substantial increases.

"Considering the number of prospects still to be covered," campaign chair Phil Granovsky said, "it seems likely that we can attain our goal of $10,200,000 to help save Soviet Jewry."

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Christians urged to unite with Jews in fighting racism

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Too many words have been spoken and now is the time for silence, for working with the Jewish people and listening to their stories, and the key word is listen," says Archdeacon James Boyles, General Secretary, Anglican Church of Canada.

He spoke at the 17th annual Christian Service in memory of the Holocaust held recently at Holy Rosary Roman Catholic Church. Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall took part.

"We can't live in isolation," said Archdeacon Boyles. "We must reach out, not to convert, but to work together. My plea to the Jewish people is to continue to share with us your stories, of faith and of the Holocaust. Though 50 years have passed, we remember."

Each bearing a lighted candle, the large congregation of Christians and Jews walked behind the processional to honor the memory of six million Jews who died in the Holocaust.

"Racism in its many forms continues to thrive in today's world," read a message to the congregation from the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto (CJDT), sponsors of the service. "If we have learned anything from the Holocaust it is that humankind must never again observe the silence of cowardice and complicity."

The theme of the hour-long service was from Psalm 62.1: For God Alone My Soul in Silence Waits.

The service included an excerpt from the book Crossing the Threshold of Hope, 1994, by Pope John Paul II in which he condemns the anti-Semitism he saw during the Nazi occupation of his Polish homeland.

"Then came the Second World War with its concentration camps and systematic extermination," read the excerpt. "First and foremost, the sons and daughters of the Jewish nation were condemned for no other reason than they were Jewish. Even if only indirectly, whoever lived in Poland at that time came into contact with this reality. Therefore, this was also a personal experience of mine, an experience I carry with me even today.

"Auschwitz, perhaps the most meaningful symbol of the Holocaust of the Jewish people, shows to what lengths a system constructed on principles of racial hatred and greed for power can go. To this day, Auschwitz does not cease to admonish, reminding us that anti-Semitism is a great sin against humanity, that all racial hatred inevitably leads to the trampling of human dignity."

Cantor Ron Graner sang Oyfn veg shteyt a boym in Yiddish and recited K'El Maleh Rachamin while the mourner's Kaddish was recited by Rabbi Lawrence Pinsker, Congregation Darchei Noam.

Those called forward to light the candelabrum designed by David Hart of Holy Blossom Temple were: Judy Cohen, survivor; Lillian Schacter, hidden child; Sientje Scholten, child of righteous Gentiles; Father Paul McGill, CJDT board; Ashley Fisch and David Warde-Farley, Jewish and Christian youth; Joanna Wilson, Holocaust Remembrance Committee, CJDT, and Peter Silverman, former resistance fighter.

Readers during the service were Mayor Hall, Michael Herman, chair, Holocaust Remembrance Committee, UJA Federation; Dirk McLean, Holy Rosary Catholic Church; and Eleanor Getzler, past chair of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, UJA Federation.

MURAL TO BE UNVEILED

A section of Under the Wings of God and the Shadow of Amalek, a mural by Toronto artist Dubi Arie, to be dedicated at Beth Emeth Synagogue May 11. Measuring 12 metres long by two metres high, the work depicts 5,000 years of Jewish history and took the Israeli-born Arie 20 years to complete. It was donated to Beth Emeth by the Silver family in memory of Norman and Regina Silver, and will be on permanent display at the synagogue. Keynote speaker at the dedication will be Prof. Yaffa Eliach of Brooklyn College, N.Y.

Eitz Chaim teaches students importance of respect

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An international program to teach children respect has come to Eitz Chaim Schools in Toronto.

Project Derech is based on the teachings in the Shulchan Aruch (Code of Jewish Law) and according to senior principal, Rabbi Aaron Levine, concentrates on general derech eretz, kibud av v'aim (respect for parents) and yirah (literally fear, but in this case, meaning recognizing the awe that one ought to have towards parents, teachers and one's elders).

Rabbi Shlomo Mund of Montreal kicked off the program, by explaining to the students and to their parents the significance of observing this mitzvah.

"Boys shoving other people in a store, or on a trip are a chillul HaShem (desecration of G-d's name) both to outsiders and to Jews alike."

On the other hand, he said, parents must be role models, reinforcing the lessons the school is teaching. "I can tell a student all day not to push, but it is no good if on a trip to the country, the parent pushes ahead of other people at a toll booth."

The students should be given recognition for using skills they learned in school, he said. For instance, he explained, the students are taught that when they are asked to do something by their parents, they should answer "with pleasure. Parents should respond the next time the children ask for something, by also answering "with pleasure."

Project Derech, which was begun by Avrum and Shanie Aberback of Toronto, can be found all over the world, including the United States, South Africa, France, England, Switzerland and Australia, and is carried out in six languages: English, Hebrew, Yiddish, German, French and Russian. In Canada, besides at Eitz Chaim in Toronto, it can be found in Montreal.

Project coordinator Susan Soroka and boys' coordinator Rabbi Eli Drebin, an eighth grade teacher at the school's Patricia branch, explained that the program is based on a series of workbooks, which cover some 50 halachot of derech eretz.

"All the grades are working on the same halachah, but at their own level," explained Soroka.

For instance, Rabbi Drebin said, there is a mitzvah to show gratitude to people who do things for you. The elementary level is asked to discuss and then draw what to do when you leave a bus or carpool.

The intermediate level grades discuss and write about how the school secretary gives change for the phone, a more complex matter from a child's point of view, and also about more sophisticated aspects, such as how showing appreciation actually honors G-d.

Other topics include not interrupting or criticizing one's parents or teachers; behaving in shul; standing up for an elderly person; being environmentally conscious; and not staring at someone who is "different," which includes the disabled.

Parents are urged to be involved, and are sent a weekly newsletter each week discussing which halachah was covered.

As well, there are periodic contests, such as to write songs or slogans. (One winning bumper sticker slogan is "You're miles ahead with Derech Eretz.") Incentives and prizes help keep the enthusiasm and excitement high.

At the Patricia branch, children bring in notes saying what mitzvah they did, and a raffle is held every so often. Elisheva Scharf, coordinator at the Viewmount branch (Malky Rabinowitz coordinates the Spring Farm branch) has created a "candid camera wall," with pictures she took of children doing derech eretz.

Children are taught specific techniques for dealing with thorny issues, such as being scolded for something they didn't do.

Although the program has been going for less than a year, results have already been seen, from the janitor and teacher stunned to be thanked by students, to a storekeeper calling to complement a student on behaving well in the store.

"This is a pleasant program," Soroka said, "with lots of stickers, balloons and prizes, and no tests. It is not at all oppressive — it just takes 20 minutes to half an hour of class time a week."

The school hopes to continue Project Derech beyond this year.

TORONTO — Accused Nazi war criminal Josef Nemsila died in hospital late last month, calling into question legal rulings on his case.

Nemsila, who was 84 and lived in Oshawa, was accused of commanding a unit responsible for the deaths of hundreds of Jews during World War II.

He had been twice convicted in his native Czechoslovakia of war-era crimes.

Ottawa was trying to deport him for lying about his past. In 1995, an immigration adjudicator ruled he could not be deported because he had been a landed immigrant for more than five years. Last year, the Federal Court overturned the ruling, and Nemsila appealed.

Now, the court is asking lawyers for submissions on whether it should still hand down a ruling.

Sol Littman of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Toronto said Nemsila's death "fulfills the government's greatest wish: that all accused Nazi war criminals die before they can be brought to justice."

Nemsila's lawyer, Ron Poulton, said his client died "in a painful way" and that the charges had caused him "misery."

Beth Tzedec exhibit explores the Jews of China

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Last summer, Dorion Liebgott intended to mount "a little exhibit" on China, but her project took on a life of its own once word got out about her plans.

The result is Jewish Communities of China: From Kaifeng to Shanghai at Beth Tzedec Congregation's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum, of which Liebgott is curator.

The exhibit, which opened for a three-month run on March 26, is a mix of artifacts (on loan from the Royal Ontario Museum) and personal items.

Even two days before the opening, people who had heard about the show were calling to offer more items.

The films Chinese Jews on the Banks of the Yellow River, produced by Israel's Beth Hatefutsot museum, and A Place to Save Your Life, by Toronto filmmaker Karen Shopsowitz, are also part of the exhibit.

The Kaifeng artifacts attest to a long-isolated Jewish community that dates back at least to the eighth century, when a large group of Persian or Indian Jews settled in the central Chinese city. Noteworthy items include a jade gong used to call people to prayer.

An illuminated "Kaifeng megillah" of indeterminate age (possibly as recent as the 18th century) is part of the synagogue museum's permanent collection, although Liebgott hasn't been able to verify whether it is actually from Kaifeng.

Given the Chinese flavor of its artwork, it may well be. Its Hebrew calligraphy was probably done in Italy or a Mediterranean country, or in China by a visiting scribe, Liebgott said.

A more recent epoch in Jewish history began when prominent Sephardi families such as the Hardoons and Sassoons left Persia and India for China in the early 1800s to establish businesses, banks and trade.

Later, Jews fleeing the Russian Revolution settled in Harbin and Tientsin (Manchuria, Central China and Japan). In the late 1930s, German and Austrian Jews found safe haven in the port city of Shanghai, where they needed neither entry visa nor passport.

Torontonian Harry Fiedler was born in Shanghai in 1940 to Austrian Jewish parents. He immigrated to Canada with his parents at age 9.

In Shanghai, "they had everything: synagogues, kosher butcher shops," he recalls.

Among the items he loaned for the display are his Chinese birth certificate and a Chanukah gelt card he received in 1945 from American Jewish soldiers.

Other mementoes and photographs attest to the diversity of the Jewish experience in China: a refugee food ticket, the nameplate of a Jewish doctor's office, photos of students at the Shanghai Jewish School and of a Jewish baby with her Chinese amah.

A wooden-headed doll is one item Liebgott finds particularly moving. Armando and Eva Salinas and their baby daughter, Liliana, then Italian citizens living in Shanghai, were sent to a Japanese internment camp in Weih-Sen in 1943. The doll's head was made by a friend in the camp as a first-birthday present for Liliana. Eva made the doll's soft body and clothes.

Also of note is a photo album depicting the family history of Dolly Beil over four generations in China. Born in Tsingtao, Beil — who sells Chinese porcelain and antiques in her eponymous Eglinton Avenue store — is the granddaughter of Russian Jews. In 1892, her grandfather arrived in Harbin, where he established the Grand Hotel. Beil immigrated here with her husband and son, in 1952, the year when most of the Jews left China.

Critical Dialogue

A year ago, in Luxembourg, the foreign ministers of the European Union passed a resolution calling on its 15 member states to continue their "critical dialogue" with Iran. Critical dialogue, apart from being beneficial to the European Union in terms of its lucrative trade relationship with Iran, was designed to dilute Iran's support for radical Islamic movements and state terrorism and to reduce its opposition to Arab-Israeli peace negotiations.

On the face of it, critical dialogue — the European alternative to the United States' dual containment policy of Iran and Iraq — seemed like a somewhat positive idea. But in fact, as the European Union discovered last month, following a celebrated three-year trial in Germany, critical dialogue was essentially a hollow shell, a self-serving policy with little hope of significantly modifying Tehran's position with respect to an array of crucial issues.

The coup de grace to critical dialogue was delivered by a judge in a Berlin court on April 10, when he soberly concluded that senior officials in Iran's government, including the president and the foreign minister, had ordered the assassination of Iranian Kurdish dissidents living in exile in Germany, Iran's biggest trading partner. As a result of the verdict, Germany recalled its ambassador in Tehran, expelled four Iranian diplomats in Bonn and announced it would, for the foreseeable future, no longer participate in critical dialogue with Iran. In a gesture of solidarity, the European Union, describing Iran's activities as a violation of international law, invited its members to recall their envoys in Tehran.

Critical dialogue, besides having failed to curb Iran's appetite for state terrorism, has not had any discernible effect in diminishing its support of destabilizing Islamic fundamentalist movements in the Middle East, a region of strategic importance to the West. Nor has it persuaded Iran to acquiesce to the Oslo peace process, which it regularly condemns in inflammatory language. More to the point, critical dialogue has not altered the Iranian regime's unalterable rejection of Israel's very existence. These are not mere words. Three weeks ago, in cooperation with Russia, Iran tested components of a long-range missile capable of striking Israel. Last week, Iran staged its largest-ever military exercises, menacingly dubbed Road to Jerusalem.

Iran remains a clear and present danger, not only to Israel but the West itself, and critical dialogue should be seen for what it is: a misplaced concept. — S.K.

Shoah v'Gvurah

The unique duality of Jewish existence, tears and triumph, finds poignant expression in the way we remember the victims of the Holocaust. We join at the heart remembrance of holocaust with remembrance of heroism into one reverently hallowed day, the 27th of Nisan, long ago specially designated as such by Israel's Knesset.

We set aside a specific calendar day for remembrance as a national tribute and a central spark around which to kindle commemorative flame among our youth. Collective memory has always been the force binding Jews to their religion and to their people.

And this is one of Judaism's true greatnesses: surviving upon collective memory even as it inspires personal remembrance, which, as everyone knows, is the only way humanly possible, for individuals to reflect on what — and who — was lost.

Campus issues fall on deaf ears

On behalf of the Jewish students attending post-secondary institutions in Metro Toronto, I want to thank The CJN for bringing our concerns to public attention. With all the noise in our community about the importance of "continuity," I thought your articles would result in my phone ringing without pause. Alas, only one person has called. The reality is that the continuity cry is only noise "full of sound and fury signifying nothing."

Toronto Jews are justifiably proud of their many achievements. However, the gross neglect of our campus population will carry a very high price in the future. If we lose our children on campus, who will be the leaders of our community in the years to come? No one cares.

The Star's coverage of Israel

Re: Ron Csillag's article on coverage of Israel in the Toronto Star, (CJN, March 27).

Your article, in an attempt to skirt the issue, fails to address the fundamental fact that the Toronto Star embraces a strong anti-Israel stance.

Of significance is the fact that Star publisher John Honderich refused to be interviewed for The CJN article. For a major Canadian newspaper to advocate the establishment of an independent Palestinian state and to distort the news to conform to this view is contrary to the basic democratic precepts of publishing.

Can't spot baby chimp in police lineup

As one of the chimpanzees cited in your recent article "Israeli Tomatoes Help Fight Assimilation," I was disappointed that your reporter, Frances Kraft, was not aware that our group has moved beyond the Hebrew sign language to mastering WordPerfect, and is now scrambling up the Internet.

I am happy to inform you that charges against the baby of our group, Zelda, accused of illegally eating gefilte fish in a "kosher food establishment" were dropped, because she was, at 18 months, under age, and because the only witness, the mashgiach, could not pick her out of the police lineup.

We have learned that preparations are under way to test elephants with the "Tevye-5" isotope. Their renowned memories, confronted with the vast richness of halachic literature, will no doubt create a formidable body of learned scholars.

Claims Rabbi Kushner's views are faulty

Re: "God can't stop all tragedies, says Rabbi Kushner" CJN, April 10). Harold Kushner may not have the last word on the problem of evil as widely assumed, as I have argued in a recent paper Theology and Theodicy: On Reading Harold Kushner (Modern Judaism, Johns Hopkins Univ. Press, October 1996).

To the extent that your reporter, Leila Speisman, has accurately distilled the essence of Kushner's recent lecture in Toronto, Kushner continues to see the Book of Job as significant for the broad religious view. As I have argued in my paper, Kushner's reading of Job is found to be faulty, as are other aspects of his argument and his overarching religious view of God, when critically assessed.

Perspective

Rabbi Yisrael Abichazira, the Baba Sali

By CANTOR AVIV OUANOUNOU

Who is a tzaddik? This question was once answered thus by Menachem Begin:

"When a man appears, watch his ways, listen to his words and look at his eyes. If you are enchanted by his ways, touched by his words and his eyes are clear and pure, then you may say: This is a tzaddik."

One such tzaddik was Rabbi Yisrael Abichazira, or as he is widely and affectionately known, the Baba Sali.

Baba Sali was famous for his dedication to his people and was one of the great tzaddikim of our times. He always strove to judge every Jew favorably, to never find any evil or wrongdoing in anyone. He saw only the good in human beings, even in those for whom others rarely had a kind word to say. This essay will briefly review the history of Baba Sali and some of the miraculous stories associated with him.

His family history starts with Rabbi Shmuel Elbaz, a prominent rabbi in the city of Arfod, in the southern part of the Sahara Desert in Morocco. Rabbi Elbaz wanted to travel to Eretz Yisrael, but did not have enough money to pay for the passage. The story relates that Rabbi Elbaz pleaded with the captain to allow him to travel to Israel. But the captain did not allow him to board the boat. So determined was Rabbi Elbaz to reach Israel, he took his chazira (little carpet, in Arabic), placed it on the water and sat on it. Miraculously, the story goes, he floated on the water alongside the boat. Thereafter, the family name became Abichazira (Abi=master, chazira=carpet: master of the carpet).

Rabbi Yisrael Abichazira was born in 1890 in the city of Tafillat, Morocco, the great grandson of Rabbi Shmuel. His father was Rav Mesood Abichazira, the eldest son of Rabbi Yaacov Abichazira, also a great zaddik and a well-known kabbalist in Morocco.

While still in his father's house, Rav Yisrael became a magnetic personality, drawing scores of people who were beset with problems and who needed his brachot and advice. He was given his diminutive name, Baba Sali, because in Arabic, it means "our praying father." After his father's death, Baba Sali, who was then only 20 years old, assumed the position of rosh yeshivah of Taffilat.

Despite Rabbi Abichazira's withdrawal from all other public activities, his doors were always open to those who needed his help. He was constantly approached to pray for the ill or for people in trouble. Thousands of stories abound about Baba Sali, all of them dealing with some aspect of miracles. Anyone who visited the tzaddik returned with a story. The following documented incidents have been taken from the book Baba Sali: Rabenu ha-kadosh by Rabbi Eliyahou Elfasi, who served for many years as Baba Sali's gabbai.

> Rav Yisrael became a magnetic personality

An admor (chassidic rebbe), came to discuss an important issue with the Rabbi Abichazira. When the admor entered the room, he and Baba Sali began to discuss talmudic subjects. In the midst of their conversation, without any reference to the specific issue which had brought the Chassid to him, the Baba Sali remarked, "Don't worry!" and continued to explain in detail why the admor should not be concerned about his particular problem.

When the admor left the rabbi's room, he was astonished that the rabbi had known what had been on his mind, without his even identifying the subject. He told those around him how the rav had sensed his fear. The members of Rav Yisrael's household however, were not the least bit surprised, because they had become used to things like this happening on a daily basis.

Several incidents related to miracles that occurred with Baba Sali's blessing over arak, a traditional Sephardi drink. It is told by many who visited the rabbi's home that Baba Sali's bottle of arak never emptied. No matter how much of the drink he poured out to his guests, the bottle remained full.

The following is a story that describes the use of arak in Baba Sali's blessing. A young woman once came to the home of the Baba Sali. Because Rav Yisrael did not see women privately, she asked to see the gabbai. She told the gabbai she had a strange dream that she wanted to share with Rav Yisrael.

The gabbai explained that the Baba Sali was very busy; a long line of people were waiting to see him. The best he could do for her was to ask the Baba Sali to bless her.

The woman did not give up, but demanded to tell the Baba Sali of her dream. Since she showed so much determination, the gabbai agreed to relate her dream to the Baba Sali.

The woman then recounted her dream. She had entered the home of the Baba Sali with a sealed bottle of arak, and had asked the rav to bless her through the bottle of arak, in the hope that she would bear healthy children. Baba Sali took the bottle and told her that she had to wait until he had G-d's permission to bless her for the sake of her children. Then, suddenly, in her dream, the cork of the bottle popped open and Baba Sali said, "With G-d's help, this year you shall bear a son!"

The gabbai went to the Baba Sali and told him the woman's dream, at which Baba Sali laughed, and responded, "Through dreams I will speak." The Baba Sali sent word to the woman that he had spoken to her through the dream, and it was not necessary to bless her again. A short time later, the woman visited the Baba Sali to tell him that she had given birth to a son.

Another incident involved a non-religious Jew named Eliyahu from the city of Holon. Eliyahu was ill, and was due to have both legs amputated. At the suggestion of a friend, he went to see the Baba Sali for a brachah. He left the hospital the day before his surgery. No one knew that he was going to see the Baba Sali.

Because of his tremendous pain, Eliyahu could not comply with the proper decorum in the rav's chamber. He could not stand and kiss the Baba Sali's hand (as was the custom) when his turn came to see the Rav. Instead, the rabbanit approached Eliyahu in the name of Baba Sali and asked him, "Do you put on tefillin? Do you observe the Shabbat? Do you make the proper blessings before and after food?" Eli could only respond that he did not, and suddenly began to cry.

Baba Sali told him that if he agreed to become more observant, G-d would hear his (Baba Sali's) prayers. Eli responded that he fully accepted the observance of the Shabbat, and he would do tshuvah (repentance).

Baba Sali then requested that Eli be served a cup of tea. After Eli finished his drink, the rabbanit suggested that he try to stand to kiss the hand of the Baba Sali. With great pain and difficulty, Eli arose, walked to the rav, kissed him and thanked him.

Baba Sali responded, "Don't thank me; just say 'Blessed are they who sanctify his name publicly!'"

Eli tried out his new legs, and in disbelief walked to Yeshivat HaNegev, near the home of the Baba Sali. The students greeted him with song, dance and praise of G-d.

Later that day, Eli returned to the home of the Baba Sali. He was worried that the miracle would not last. The Baba Sali reassured him. In light of his commitment to keep the Shabbat and other mitzvot, Eli's ill fate had been nullified by G-d.

Eli then called his doctor at the Tchilov hospital in Tel Aviv. The doctor told Eli to stop acting like a crazy person, and asked him to be in the hospital the following morning for the surgery. The next day, Eli went to the hospital, healthy as ever. Several days later, Eli went to thank Baba Sali again, who had a seudat hoda'ah (meal of thanksgiving) prepared. At the end of the meal, the Baba Sali gave Eli a bottle of arak for the doctors to drink a l'chaim.

Baba Sali's name spread far and wide, and he became known to many rabbis. He also corresponded with scholars and chachamim from Eastern Europe and America. Many of them made special efforts to visit the rabbi at his house.

Baba Sali died on the 4th of Shvat 5744 (1984). He left many students and followers. Over 150,000 people attended his funeral. May his memory be blessed and may he pray for all of the Jewish nation, wherever they are found.

Cantor Ouanounou is the chazzan of Magen David Sephardi Congregation in Toronto.

Opinions

Where exactly is Har Choma?

By Viva Press in Halifax

Lately, the Har Choma housing project has dominated the news. Middle East analysts, historians, and "experts" have had their say about the project and its impact on the peace process. The following is my say.

The term Har Choma is an ambiguous one. Sure, we all know it has been blamed as the cause for the most recent tensions between Israel and the Palestinians.

But, where exactly is it?

A little while ago, I was speaking to my parents, and we got into a debate. I said Israel should continue to build at Har Choma. My mother disagreed. Her arguments covered everything I've already heard on the news.

I've read in the papers, surfed on the Web, seen on TV and heard on the radio all the views rejecting the building of the new Jewish homes: Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu just wants to cause trouble, Israel can build elsewhere, Israel is trying to provoke the Arabs, and most importantly, the Har Choma project "is in East Jerusalem."

I repeated those words in my head: East Jerusalem. Then I thought, I wonder how many people really know where East Jerusalem is. The press tells us it's where the Arab villages are; it's part of Arab territory.

But isn't all of Israel surrounded by Arab villages? Isn't that what makes Israel a place with so many hostile relations? Isn't it the land to which the world's three largest religions lay claim?

I cannot accept the reasoning that Har Choma shouldn't be built because it's near Arab villages. The whole land of Israel borders on many Arab towns and villages. That Jews occupy land at all is reason for confrontation according to the Palestinians.

As a journalist, I am aware of the biases that exist in the media.

I know that when a country as volatile as Israel is headline news, there must be more to the story than space limitations are allowing to be told.

From the media we know Har Choma is in East Jerusalem. What does that mean?

Where is East Jerusalem?

When I asked my parents if they remembered staying at Mitzpe Ramat-Rachel in Jerusalem when we were in Israel for my sister's bat-mitzvah in 1989, they said yes.

Then I told them Har Choma was close by.

"Oh," they said. "That changes everything."

Yes, it does. Knowing that Har Choma is in East Jerusalem is one thing. Knowing that it's in East Jerusalem, which is still very much a part of the Jewish homeland's capital city, is another thing.

Now, there is a different perspective on the debate between those who think Har Choma is a bad idea and those who think it's a good idea. Now, we are no longer just talking about an idea; we are talking about a piece of land with which we are familiar.

Should the Har Choma project be built?

I think so. I don't think it has anything to do with the success of the peace process. When the leader of one of the parties involved in the peace process continues to call for jihad, never recants what he says and blames a new housing project on Israel's lack of commitment to peace, I think there's something more to the story about the recent downfall of the peace process than a housing project.

I believe the Jewish people should be able to build on their land.

And they should be able to do so, without all the pressure from the rest of the world.

When Israel and the Palestinian Authority signed the Oslo accords, it was understood that Israel would unilaterally decide the future of Jerusalem and its boundaries. That means that Jerusalem was never put on the chopping block: not the Old City, not the new city, not North Jerusalem, not Southern Jerusalem, not the West, and definitely not the East of Jerusalem.

The Palestinians know that. Now, it's time to make sure the world knows too.

Ah, those hiking and biking days

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It is my habit to follow events in Israel rather closely, but somehow a fundraising event that involves biking and hiking from north to south had escaped my attention. Now Carol Lavine has sent me the details of this event that is sponsored by Canadian Friends of Hebrew University. Called Third Mission With a Difference, it evokes my envy as well as fond memories.

The envy is easy to explain. I wish I had the koach to participate in the event and, manifestly, I haven't got it.

But my memory is quite alive, for as a young man I spent my school days biking and my vacations, hiking. We did not have a car and so most of the time, I used my bicycle to reach my high school and later, the university. I traversed the city of Berlin for three-quarters of an hour to bike to my tennis club, and after a day's tournament I still had to pedal my way back. As for hiking, that was the accepted vacation mode of my early years. Our youth group would travel to some part of the land and then set out on long walking tours, spending the nights at youth hostels. Best (or rather, worst) of all was the way we used to ski: with the few ski-lifts being beyond our economic means, we would climb the mountains for many hours just to have that one downhill run. Skiing, for me, was quite obviously secondary to hiking and climbing.

Now comes this attractive event in Israel. Walkathons are common features of fundraising, and this one has an additional distinction in that the participants have to raise the money before they can join. They will both bike and hike and see the land from a perspective usually not available to the average tourist who goes by bus or car. I have never had that opportunity, and I am sure that it will reveal the land in a very special and to me, largely unknown light.

Here are some examples of the program: May 23: Start your biking in the picturesque lanes of Mt. Carmel. In the course of today's cycling, en route to Zichron Ya'akov, you will pass through charming small villages and vineyards that are the source of the famous locally produced Carmel wines.

The next day is a walking day: Walk along Nahal Oren, on the western slope of the Carmel. On the way, you will see some of the landmarks left by prehistoric people some 12,000 years ago. The charming path winds through a river bed near Nir Etzion, and then the route takes you to the artists' village of Ein Hod, four to five hours of walking time.

And so it goes through the whole program that ends in Jerusalem.

I wish the participants well, and may they find the fundraising not too difficult. Meanwhile, if any reader feels inclined to have a go at this, call or fax Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University in Toronto: Phone 416-485-8000, Fax 416-485-8565. The event is scheduled for May 21 to 30.

Remembering giant Torah scholar

By Justin Korda in Montreal

Last year at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, I had the honor of being one of 20 students who participated in the last Medieval Biblical Commentators course taught by Prof. Nechama Leibowitz.

Before I left for Israel, I had heard of Leibowitz's outstanding abilities as a master teacher and world renowned Bible scholar and commentator.

However, it was not until I met her that I realized why she is considered one of the greatest Torah scholars of this century. Being accepted as one of her students was an honor beyond my expectations.

Once a week for the entire semester, I arrived at Leibowitz' house with my Bible in hand, eager for our lesson. In her humble study, crammed wall to wall with weekly commentaries that she had been writing since 1942, we surrounded her desk in anticipation and nervousness, wondering if we would be able to answer any of her perplexing questions. Nechama, as she preferred us to call her, insisted on doing the roll call every week, despite the challenge that her hearing posed at age 92. As she called out names, students screamed aloud to indicate their presence and then we proceeded with our lecture. As time progressed, it became very clear to me why Leibowitz is considered to have one of the greatest minds ever and my appreciation at being able to hear her words first hand grew steadily.

On the Sabbath of April 12, Nechama Leibowitz died at age 92.

Judaism traditionally sees the study of Jewish text in memory of a deceased person as a fitting way to memorialize him or her. This idea stems from the doctrine of trying to find a positive aspect within every experience. By learning Jewish texts that are saturated with morals and lessons, one acquires these positive elements and thereby changes for the better. When a person experiences a positive change as a result of learning something in memory of one who has died, they ensure that the memory of that person lives on, for it is carried within them.

Leibowitz devoted her life to education. She taught a positive lesson to everyone she had contact with. For me, she exemplifies the capability to break down barriers while at the same time attaining great heights.

At 92, Leibowitz was as sharp-witted as any of her students. With her impeccably good humor, her subtle relish of sarcasm and her abundance of modern analogies, she made it clear that she understood us despite the gap in age.

A Torah scholar who is accepting of any and every Jew interested in learning Torah is unfortunately hard to find these days. Leibowitz, however, would respond to everyone who sent her questions and her weekly commentaries on the Torah portions were distributed to thousands of students, in Hebrew and English, in Israel and abroad. She used to travel all over the country giving speeches in various locations.

As someone who sincerely welcomed every person to explore her fascination with Torah, Leibowitz received a welcome in every walk of Israeli life: the Kibbutz, the army, the school, the home — Orthodox or otherwise. In time, even the Haredim recognized her authority, despite her gender.

For a scholar of her stature, Leibowitz's attributes of modesty, generosity and wisdom have been compared to similar characteristics of Moses. At her funeral in Jerusalem, over 1,000 mourners gathered to pay tribute to her. But, in accordance with her wishes, there were no eulogies delivered.

Aside from opening my eyes to many of the marvels of the Torah, Nechama Leibowitz's unique teaching style taught me a valuable lesson. "Don't write that, put down your pen and listen," she would always cry. She demanded that we spend the time with her developing the skills for analyzing the text so that we would gain the ability to learn on our own in the future.

As a result of her teaching style, we not only understood the content of the course, but we learned how to properly learn. This is a very profound lesson. In every one of life experiences there is something to gain. However, this gain is too often seen as the achievement of a goal. True insight comes from experiencing the process that one follows in order to reach that goal.

It was an honor to have been one of Leibowitz's students, and it is now a privilege to be able to keep her spirit alive. May her memory be eternally blessed.

The Holocaust and Sephardi Jews

By Sheldon Kirshner

Since the vast majority of Holocaust victims were Ashkenazi Jews, scholars have tended to focus on their tragedy, leaving Sephardi Jews in something of a lurch.

Del Fuego: Sephardim and the Holocaust (Sepher-Hermon Press, $25 US) makes an attempt to compensate for this error of omission. The book is based on lectures delivered over a six-year period under the auspices of the Jacob E. Safra Institute of Sephardic Studies at the Yeshiva University. It was published in cooperation with the World Zionist Organization.

Consisting of almost two dozen essays, the volume is edited by Solomon Gaon and M. Mitchell Serels.

The essays, which vary drastically in quality, deal in the main with Yugoslavia and Greece, but touch on Bulgaria, Morocco, Tunisia, Libya, Holland, France, Albania, Germany and Austria.

Rachel Dalven's passable essay, entitled Holocaust in Janina, concentrates on the Italian zone of occupation in Greece. Italy, she observes, took no measures against the Jews. But once Germany was in charge, the situation deteriorated. By war's end, 91 percent of Janina's Jewish population had been deported.

The fate of Salonica's community — the centre of Greek Jewry — was similar. Between March 15 and Aug. 7, 1943, more than 16 convoys carried 45,659 Jews, or 97 percent of the Jewish population, to Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen, writes David Altabe in a refreshingly thorough essay.

The death toll, he claims, might have been lower had Rabbi Koretz — Salonica's chief rabbi — encouraged Jews to evade the deportation orders.

On the island of Rhodes, wrested by Italy from the Ottoman Empire in 1912, the Jews fared no better, writes Marc Angel in an enlightening article. Severe anti-Jewish measures were already in effect by 1936, but with the German seizure of Rhodes, the status of the Jews plummeted, exposing them to deportation.

Jews in Morocco were deported to Auschwitz

According to Solomon Gaon, less than one-third of Yugoslavia's 75,000 Jews were of Sephardi origin. They, too, were in the wrong place at the wrong time. All told, the Germans and their local collaborators murdered 60,000 Jews. Gaon's documentation of the extermination process is at best skimpy.

In a somewhat better piece, Vicki Tamir explains the survival of Bulgarian Jewry. And in a competent essay on Moroccan Jews, M. Mitchell Serels writes that while the community suffered a minimum of discomfort, stateless Jews were sent off to France and thence to Auschwitz.

Jews in the Italian colony of Libya were subjected to anti-Semitic laws, but in the 1940s several hundred found themselves considerably worse off in Italian and German labor camps, relates Maurice Roumani in an all-too-brief essay.

In a rambling essay on Tunisia, Serels discloses a little-known fact, namely that 2,500 Tunisian Jews died in labor camps.

Regrettably, Del Fuego, which lacks even an index, generally falls short of the mark. It's clear that the definitive work on Sephardim and the Holocaust has yet to be written.

Yom Hashoah time for reflection

Yom Hashoah, which falls later this week, is a time for reflection, a time to immerse oneself in the literature of the Holocaust.

There is no shortage of new books about the greatest tragedy to befall the Jewish people. Here, described in capsule reviews, are some of the latest ones.

Every once in a while, a book of sterling scholarship comes our way. The World Reacts to the Holocaust (Johns Hopkins Press, $65 US) is one such volume.

Edited by David Wyman, the renowned American scholar, The World Reacts to the Holocaust is a major reference work of almost 1,000 pages that chronicles the impact of the shoah on 22 countries ranging from Canada and Germany to Poland and the former Soviet Union.

The highly informative essays, written by first-rate scholars like Meir Michaelis and Irving Abella, deal with a number of issues. Among them: the history of Jewish settlement, the extent of anti-Semitism, the nature of Jewish-Christian relations, the degree of collaboration, the efforts to save Jews, the treatment of Holocaust survivors after 1945, the impact of war crimes trials and the rebuilding of post-war Jewish communities.

The faces of survivors are usually a relief map of the tumult they have borne. In Written in Memory: Portraits of the Holocaust (Raincoast Books, $19.95 US), survivors, male and female, pose for Jeffrey Wolin's camera, revealing a wide range of emotions and fragments of their harrowing lives.

Our hearts go out to the children, the poor, hapless souls who perished in the Holocaust. So brace yourself for French Children of the Holocaust (New York University Press, $95 US), Serge Klarsfeld's heart-rending memorial to 2,500 Jewish children who were murdered from 1942 to 1944. The children's photographs are accompanied by biographical data.

Charlotte Delbo, a noted essayist, was a French resistance leader — and a Catholic — who endured the infamy of a death camp in Poland. In Auschwitz and After (Yale University Press, $16 US), she relates her experiences and breaks new ground by addressing the psychology of survivors.

It is not unusual for the children of survivors to be affected by their trauma. In The War After (McClelland & Stewart, $32.99), Anne Karpf, a British journalist, writes a moving account of her mother's torment in Plaszow and Auschwitz and its effect on her own life.

In Fortress of my Youth (Telador Publishing, Australia), Jana Renee Friesova, a Czech survivor, poignantly recounts her ordeal, a bitter one leavened by an idyllic interlude, in the Terezin camp.

Erica Fischer tells a true and extraordinary love story in Aimee & Jaguar (Harper Collins, $33.75), set in wartime Germany. Elisabeth Wust, the wife of a Nazi officer, meets Felice Schragenheim — a Jewish woman in hiding, as she later learns — in a Berlin coffee shop. They form a romantic relationship which, tragically, is shattered by a betrayal. Fifty years later, Wust looks back at the intense affair.

First published in 1969, Simon Wiesenthal's The Sunflower (Random House, $33.50) has resurfaced in a revised edition. When Wiesenthal, the Nazi hunter, was an inmate in a concentration camp, a dying SS officer, haunted by the crimes he had committed, sought absolution from him. What would you have done in his place? In this thought-provoking book, 46 thinkers, from theologians to human rights activists, grapple with the problem, delineating the limits of vengeance, forgiveness, responsibility, justice and compassion.

PRIDE of ISRAEL

In recent weeks, an alarming trend has emerged from within our ranks. Issued have been calls for disunity and separation. The movement to delegitimize Jews based on their choice of worship is not only insulting. It is also frightening and dangerous. Indeed, the demand to see your way as the only way is precisely the one thing that world Jewry does not need at this moment. Nevertheless, we are seeing this here at home and abroad in the chambers of the Israeli Knesset.

What we need now is a continuing stream of positive, coordinated movements towards understanding and tolerance. We need to send forth the messages that all Jews are to be respected, that we can both live together and work together.

'Since they sat silently and said nothing for a defense'
– Talmud Bavli Gittin 55b.

We, the congregation of the Pride of Israel, are lending our voice to the many that are disturbed. We are also determined to remind the community that our Judaism is the only thing that binds us together. There is no 'you' and 'them', there is an 'us'.

So let us work together to remind the world, and ourselves, that we are am echad, one people.

Am Yisrael Chai!

In spite of tamai, God still loves us

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

"And so shall he do for the tent of meeting, that dwells with them in the midst of their being tamai" (Leviticus, 16:16).

The Talmud (Yoma, 56b-57a) reports an incident involving a scoffer who said to Rabbi Hanina — Now (that you, the Jewish people, are in exile), you are surely tamai. Rabbi Hanina responded: Come and contemplate what is written concerning them — "...that dwells with them in the midst of their being tamai" — meaning that even at the time that they (the people of Israel) are tamai, the Shekhinah (Godly presence) abides with them." (Notice that I have not translated the word "tamai." All the attempts at translation, ranging from "defiled" to "unclean," simply do not cut it. Tamai is tamai, period).

Rashi to this verse in Aharay Mot, and basing himself on this episode, comments that "even though the people of Israel may be tamai, the Godly presence still abides with them."

There seems to be nothing unusual about how Rashi explains the biblical words. He merely paraphrases the response of Rabbi Hanina to the heretic as projecting the true meaning of the verse.

Yet that in itself is unusual. Rabbi Hanina's response to the question-challenge was sharp and to the point, and certainly not inconsistent with the verse quoted. But it is quite a jump from deriving an implication from a Biblical passage to asserting that this implication entails the precise meaning of that passage.

After all, the passage refers quite clearly to a process that took place in the Mishkan, the sanctuary. There is no indication that it refers to life outside the sanctuary, or when the sanctuary no longer functions because it has been destroyed.

Jews thrust into exile

Rashi does make that jump, and in so doing challenges us to understand what is the significance of this.

Is it far-fetched to extrapolate that Rashi saw in this encounter, as reported in the Talmud, a powerful statement about the complexity of Jewish life in exile?

If the Jews were thrust into exile, this meant that God had rejected them. If that is the case, how could the Jewish people still pretend to be people of God?

The heretic argued that they were rejected by God because they had sinned, and because of their having sinned, could no longer lay claim to any extraordinary Divine connection.

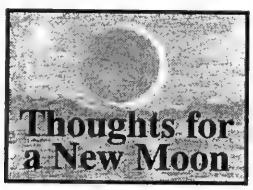
Rabbi Hanina calmly pointed out to him the verse we have herein cited. This verse projects a fascinating reciprocity in the God-Israel relationship. God is with the people even when they are far from perfect.

In the same way as Israel expresses its unconditional faith in and love of God via the Shema (with all your soul — even if God should take away your soul — Talmud, Berakhot, 54a), so too does God express unconditional love of Israel, even if they are "tamai."

Rashi sees in the biblical verse more than a statement. Rashi sees in it a promise, a promise that transcends space and time. It is forever. And it is what the verse intends to convey. It is the meaning of the text.

Is this explanation far-fetched? Hardly. And now that we know how God feels about us, it is important that we not allow anyone, or any group, even of rabbis, to suggest anything to the contrary.

Rabbi Bulka is spiritual leader of Congregation Machzikei Hadas in Ottawa.



Israel withstands struggle despite the problems faced

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As the political and social events unfold in Israel, there are some people who feel a shadow hanging over the country as Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel's Independence Day, is celebrated this month.

It has been a difficult year with many conflicts both internally and externally. People wonder what the outcome will be of the religious confrontations, the peace process and the judicial/religious rulings that have been made. Perhaps it is important to take a moment and focus on Israel itself.

The biblical/historical timeline of the country has provided us with several names for this tiny sliver of land. Our ancestors were promised a land which then bore the name Canaan. The land itself has been called both Israel and Judea, sometimes simultaneously and sometimes separately. In and among the many names, there have also been a handful of foreign names imposed upon it. It is interesting that among all the names available for this land, we have chosen to name it Israel. In so naming the country, we have linked the land to the destiny of the people. I do not mean that had it borne another name there would be no link, for we know that our hearts and souls are tied to that land irreversibly. However, the name of Israel has a specific meaning as given in the Bible and that meaning seems to have infused the land.

Our patriarch Jacob returns home (to the land of Canaan) after a lengthy absence. He fled in fear of his brother Esau and a return to his home necessitates a confrontation with Esau. On the evening before this confrontation, Jacob remains alone, possibly contemplating whether tomorrow will bring a joyous or a violent reunion. As he sits alone, he becomes aware of an intruder and grabs this person. He wrestles with him all night.

Just before dawn, the intruder demands to be freed and Jacob demands a blessing in return. The intruder asks Jacob what his name is and then renames him, granting him the name Israel as a blessing. The Bible alludes to the fact that the intruder is an angel and the name Israel is later bestowed onto Jacob by G-d.

The reason the angel gives for the name Israel is that Jacob has wrestled with man and with G-d and was able to withstand the struggle. The word "Israel" appears in the future tense. Thus it is a reflection of their meeting, as well as a prediction for the future; it is a destiny. We have named our country Israel. All too often we as a people are wrestling with man and G-d and we are seeing our tiny land sharing that struggle.

Jacob walks away from his encounter with a blessing, but he also walks away with an injury. Jacob injures his leg and limps as a result of that confrontation.

We struggle with each other over G-d, we struggle with other people in the world and we also bear our injuries. Yet the angel's final statement should not be lost for either the people Israel or the country: we wrestle with man and with G-d yet we can withstand the struggle.

Paying homage to Avotaynu

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Once every three months, as soon as they receive the day's mail, throngs of dedicated Jewish genealogists around the world drop whatever they're doing to read the latest issue of Avotaynu: The International Review of Jewish Genealogy.

Now in its 12th year of publication, Avotaynu is an indispensible and definitive source of current information on relevant records in dozens of countries where our ancestors once walked. Weighing in at a minimum of 68 pages, each issue typically contains between 20 and 30 articles on topics as varied as new archival discoveries in Lithuania, Warsaw's sprawling Jewish cemetery, French naturalization documents and how to use photographs to solve family puzzles.

Avotaynu boasts a democratic mix of contributors. They include professional genealogists, leading academics, state archivists from Eastern Europe and elsewhere, noted freelance writers and non-professional genealogists whose descriptions of their own research accomplishments are frequently among the most compelling reads in the magazine. As expected, the articles run the gamut from thoroughly footnoted scholarly studies to warm personal rambles.

Each issue also contains reviews, news, letters and summaries of the contents of newsletters from many of the more than 60 Jewish genealogical societies around the world. Delivered to more than 3,000 subscribers in 25 countries, Avotaynu is an important communal bulletin board that always sets off a buzz of comment.

Gary Mokotoff of New Jersey and Sallyann Amdur Sack of Maryland, who have been publisher and editor respectively since jointly founding the quarterly in 1985, are "on a first-name basis" with leading archivists at institutions like Yad Vashem, the Library of Congress, the Mormon Family History Library and the U.S. National Archives and its counterparts in Canada and Israel.

As the 84-page Winter 1996 issue demonstrates – with such items as an interview by Sack of the new Polish state archivist Daria Nalecz – Avotaynu particularly excels in keeping readers abreast of the changing availability of relevant collections in various ex-Soviet and former communist bloc nations.

"We're on the leading edge of what archival records are available in Eastern Europe," asserts Mokotoff. "It's now recognized in the American genealogical community that if you have Eastern European ancestors you must read Avotaynu, whether you're Jewish or not."

Popular books like Arthur Kurzweil's From Generation to Generation and Dan Rottenberg's Finding Our Fathers make excellent introductions to the subject, but if you want to remain current there's no substitute for Mokotoff's and Sack's publication, which they co-own.

In recent years, Avotaynu, Inc. has branched out into publishing important reference works. In April, the Association of Jewish Librarians named a recent Avotaynu publication – Alexander Beider's 570-page Dictionary of Jewish Surnames From The Kingdom Of Poland – as Outstanding Reference Book of the Year. The award is to be handed out in June.

It's the second time that Avotaynu Inc. has been so honored: one of its earliest books, Where Once We Walked: A Guide to the Jewish Communities Destroyed in the Holocaust, won the same award in 1991. A gazetteer of 21,000 localities, arranged alphabetically and indexed through the phonetic Daitch-Mokotoff Soundex System, Where Once We Walked has proven to be one of the most useful aids in helping researchers pinpoint ancestral shtetls.

One of Avotaynu Inc.'s current book projects is Eliyahu's Branches by Israeli researcher Chaim Freedman. It's a compendium of more than 17,000 descendants of the famed Vilna Gaon – including a brother-in-law of Vladimir Lenin, an ex-wife of actor Leonard Nimoy, and Freedman himself.

Publication is slated for September or October, and coincides with the 200th anniversary of the Vilna Gaon's death.

The entrepreneurially-minded Mokotoff, who served six years until 1995 as head of the worldwide Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies, is planning to produce a CD-ROM containing all back issues of Avotaynu to date. Its 1,500 to 2,000 pages of information, he contends, will be the most powerful and comprehensive reference work available on the subject of Jewish genealogy. The estimated publication date is 1998.

THEN, NOW, AND ...

By Sarah Karpen Shapir

Memories are flowing in my mind,
One the other chasing wild,
Streaming and asking: "Imprint the past,
Events are covered with years of dust,
Already unbelieved, shadowed with age,
Pen me down on this page."

And I recall the summer day, hot, sweaty, heavy in air tired of breathing, choking the throat;
how tiny and helpless I was against all.
Looked around begging for help, for a voice, a hand, a might, a will.

BUT IDLE, INDIFFERENT
THE WORLD STOOD STILL.
On this day plunged degraded of human face
I was orphaned to the lowest disgrace.
In one day — no parents,
no brothers all vanished in death.
Taken away without witness or trace.
Where did they take you? where did you go?
Are you an enemy? to be killed in war?
Are the Germans afraid of my little brothers, with their skeleton bodies, lamed on crutches?
What did you do? What is your sin?
That you were born Jewish and alive still?
Me — I died with you on this day.

Orphaned my soul of belief and faith,
Emptied of hopes and trust in man.
Alone I was — and never the same.
With no tears, complaints or cries?
Just one word stayed and nagged — WHY?

Birds sing lovely on heavy trees, rivers flow in sweet streams,
Flowers blossom in fragrance and fun,
Meadows color bathing in sun.
The clock ticks tacks measures the time
And memories become yesterday's crime.

Here I am young and strong,
With my first baby a new born son.
Kissing and hugging him in my tights
I see a better future rise.
Pinky and rosy like his cheeks,
I hope for a world of love and peace,
in his eyes of deeply blue,
I see babies laughing through.
O! — yes reborn in his myth
Again restored is my wit.
And for children still to come,
Please give love and care for everyone:
For this I pray to you in my words;
PLEASE LISTEN TO ME G-D.

No big changes at Toronto Sun, as Goldstein takes editor's chair

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — If Lorrie Goldstein had his way, the headline to this story might have read, Sun, CJN Scribes in Gab-Fest.

Well, not really. Even though Goldstein was recently named the Toronto Sun's editor, he doesn't oversee headlines, story assignments, reporters' comings and goings or (sorry guys) page 3. Rather, he's in charge of the Sun's many and (sometimes) sharp-tongued columnists, Donato's cartoons and about half its daily editorials.

Daily newsroom goings-on are the task of the editor-in-chief, Peter O'Sullivan. Both he and Goldstein report to publisher Hartley Steward. But it's Goldstein's job to make sure the Sun's rather distinctive voice comes through loud and clear; and with voices like John Downing, George Jonas, Peter Worthington, Walter Stewart and Allan Fotheringham, the job might seem easy.

Lorrie Goldstein

Goldstein, 44, is not the scrappy tabloid's first Jewish editor — Barbara Amiel held the post in the '80s. He joined Toronto's Little Paper That Grew in 1978 as a general assignment reporter and rose through the ranks, from the police blotter to City Hall, feature writer, Queen's Park bureau chief, city editor and as of April 1, (no fooling), editor.

In addition to combing through the 27 pages of opinion the Sun's columnists produce each week, Goldstein himself will pen a twice-weekly column, and will be a regular pundit on radio station CFRB.

Goldstein foresees little, if any, change under his stewardship. He says he wants to write better editorials but otherwise, columnists will be allowed to keep their wide latitude. And despite the often anti-Israel tone sounded by writer Eric Margolis, Goldstein says the Sun "is one of the strongest, perhaps the strongest, supporter of Israel of any paper in North America."

But, he told The CJN from his King Street offices, that doesn't mean the paper will be a blind cheerleader for Israel.

"I'd match our coverage and support [for Israel] with just about anybody. In fact, one of our original mandates was to be pro-Israel. But being supportive doesn't mean continuing, uncritical applause. I can point to times when we are often looked askance by both sides in the debate." For a newspaperman, that means he's doing something right.

A recent column by Goldstein recalled his being adopted, and it touched a nerve city-wide. He was the only son of Al and Rose Goldstein, both now deceased. Al ran Al's Menswear on Yonge Street; Lorrie attended Beth Sholom's afternoon school five days a week, and was bar mitzvah at Beth David congregation under the late Rabbi Albert Pappenheim. Goldstein's son Alan recently marked his bar mitzvah at Shaarei Zedec synagogue on Markham Street.

The Sun has also been strong on the community's pursuit of Nazi war criminals. "If you don't pursue Nazi war criminals," Goldstein says, "then you won't pursue modern-day war criminals. And we have to do both."

Like all print journalists, Goldstein faces increased newsprint costs, competition from the Internet and tight budgets. But with an average daily readership approaching 1 million, "we'll continue to be a clear voice on the issues."

CORRECTION

An article in last week's CJN on the community's Yom Hashoah commemorative service to take place May 4 indicated that Irena Leskowicz will be honored posthumously as Righteous Among the Nations for having saved Jews during World War II.

Although Mrs. Leskowicz will indeed be honored at the ceremony, it will not be posthumously. Thankfully, Mrs. Leskowicz is alive and well.

The CJN regrets the error. Incorrect information was supplied to us.

JOIN THE CHORUS OF CONDEMNATION AND DEMAND ACTION IMMEDIATELY!

More than 50 years after the Holocaust, dozens of those believed to be responsible for tormenting and murdering countless thousands are living comfortably in Canada. Their presence is a blemish on our highly respected international reputation.

Find out WHEN they got here, HOW they have managed to escape prosecution, WHAT Ottawa can do and WHY they must go.

Today, there is a growing groundswell of support for swift government action against these alleged Nazi war criminals in our midst.

Ontario Jewish Archives seek bits and pieces of history

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Berkeley Street Shul, Eastern Children of Israel, on Berkeley north of Queen Street, was demolished in the early 1960s to make way for the Moss Park housing development. But one family, the Solomons, who had a scrapyard on Parliament Street, managed to save the cornerstone and the marble tablets.

These are preserved along with a remarkable province-wide collection of documentary records, artifacts and photographs amassed by the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) in the Lipa Green Building on north Bathurst Street.

The OJA mandate, says director Stephen Speisman, author of The Jews of Toronto, is to collect, preserve and document the heritage of the Jews in Ontario.

"We want our collection to represent the record of Jewish life in the province in all its aspects, including those which may embarrass us," says Speisman. "We collect in a non-political manner, from any element of the Jewish community, regardless of where it stands in the political or religious spectrum."

In the Toronto area, the OJA is a department of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Beyond the GTA, it is under the aegis of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

The archives had a modest beginning.

Within Canadian Jewish Congress central region, a not very active archives committee, probably instituted in the 1950s, collected records, mainly from Congress, and sent them to national headquarters in Montreal.

Around the same time, the Toronto Jewish Historical Society (TJHS), a group of lay people, were meeting to explore Jewish history.

In the early 1970s, responding to pressure from would-be researchers, representatives of Congress and the TJHS merged to form a viable archives committee. Victor Sefton, an executive member of Congress and president of the historical society, was appointed chair.

Thus, Canadian Jewish Congress Central Region Archives (later to be changed to Ontario Jewish Archives) was born. Speisman, then a graduate student in history at the University of Toronto, became its first director, a position he holds to this day.

A space at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue that served a double purpose — it was also used as a changing room for the waitresses — was the first home for the archives.

"We had to knock on the door before entering to make sure that the waitresses were out," Speisman recalls.

In 1974, there was a move to the old Chudleigh House on Beverly Street, which also accommodated the Jewish Immigrant Aid Society. The archives was allotted one cramped room at first, but by 1976, it occupied the entire second floor.

In 1983, plans to settle into offices with a temperature/humidity controlled storage area or "vault" in the new Lipa Green Building were put on hold for 10 weeks until the facility could be completed.

During that time, Speisman was left alone to guard the heritage treasures in the two buildings comprising the now-deserted Chudleigh House. "I ran around putting on lights to give the illusion of full occupancy and called everyone I knew on the street to park cars in front of the building," he recalls.

Speisman works with his assistant, archivist Howard Markus, and a committed corps of volunteers who have been with him for many years. There is also close cooperation with the Jewish Genealogical Society.

Particularly relevant in the collection are minutes, financial reports, newsletters and pertinent artifacts from organizations, synagogues, burial and loan societies; military records and medals; immigrant memorabilia including "schiffscarten;" early photographs and letters.

People ask, "Why should I contribute to the archives? Why shouldn't I keep these cherished possessions at home?"

Speisman answers, "In your home, many items will eventually disintegrate. Here, we are equipped to preserve them."

He tells the story about rescuing "wonderful records" literally from the garbage truck when the Folks Farein was moving out of Cecil Street. The people who were taking over the building were unaware that these records had been promised to the OJA and had put them out at the curb. Someone in the area noticed them and called Speisman.

Some of the papers had already been picked up, but Speisman quickly contacted Sol Edell, then OJA chair, who rounded up a couple of young men from the city of unemployment office. He also called the Works Department to find out where the garbage truck would be heading and the chase was on. They saved more than 20 percent of the records just before the crusher came along. The memory is still vivid, he says.

The archives serves a cross-section of individuals and organizations, Jewish and non-Jewish, students, genealogists, writers, all interested for diverse reasons in recapturing a colorful past.

The earliest original document in the collection, dated 1855, is the deed to a plot of land on Market Street near the St. Lawrence Market purchased by Abraham Nordheimer, a piano maker from Bavaria.

Correction

In the poem, "God's Left Hand Man" in the Passover literary supplement, we inadvertently substituted the word "graves" for "groves." The second last verse should have read: "Late that evening, Noah's wife wondered why/ her husband had not come home. She searched/ for him amongst the groves. Found him fast asleep..."

The CJN regrets the error.

Importance of family life often forgotten, says prof.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —The Jewish community is often remiss in exercising its responsibility to family life, the director of the Jewish Studies Program at University of Toronto charged recently.

"If we don't do our job to strengthen the moral integration of the family, then we don't deserve G-d's presence among us," said Prof. David Novak.

Novak was the first speaker in a three-part symposium on The Jewish Family as it Faces the Challenges of the Future, sponsored by Canadian Friends of Shalom Hartman Institute.

Judaism recognizes the importance of family life, he said, but traditionally the Jewish community has not done what it can to enhance it.

If a child comes from a non-observant home and studies in a religious school, said Novak, his teachers must not turn him against his parents. "In the zeal of teachers, the message might come across that these students should make a break from their parents.

"Bringing a Jewish child into the world is a mitzvah and that [alone] is the object of respect. The message might come through that their parents are a negative influence and the student should be separated from them. That is contrary to Jewish law."

It is important, he stressed, that Jewish parents are given the respect they deserve. "In terms of non-observant parents, it is the duty of the community to influence young people to lead a good Jewish life and also [give] gratitude and affection to their parents.

"No matter how much we encourage our young people to be baalei tshuvah we must emphasize the importance of parenthood."

Within its educational institutions, he said, the Jewish community must be careful not to undermine the parent-child relationship "which is so crucial to the Jewish family."

The Jewish community is also neglecting its responsibility towards agunot said Novak. "Jewish law says that when a woman marries, the marriage is not meant to be exploitive. With the breakdown of a traditional community however, Jewish men are able to abandon their wives and refuse to give them a get."

It is a situation, he said, that mainly affects religious women. "Non-observant husbands can usually be persuaded. The worst offenders are [usually] religiously observant Jews.

"If this continues to go on, we are [essentially] telling Jewish women that entering into a marriage is a dangerous proposition."

The problem of agunah is our internal problem, said Novak, and "Jewish internal problems are to be resolved within the community, not outside. The fact that we have to go to secular courts is an immoral indictment."

One solution to the problem, he said, is a mechanism by which rabbis can have a marriage annulled. "It has to be done carefully but it does have a basis in Jewish law."

If we encourage people to understand their rights and make their voices heard, a solution can be found, he said. "This is something about which a national forum should be held and leaders of the organized community should be called on the carpet.

"When marriage is under attack and we refuse to do what we can, it is an moral indictment of a community. It is not serving the family as it should."

Music used as tool in healing process

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Illness is isolating, says Etta Ginsberg McEwan, coordinator of the Toronto Jewish Healing Project.

The project was inaugurated two years ago by Rabbi Dow Marmur of Holy Blossom Temple to combat that isolation and offer spiritual solace in a Jewish context. The group is not affiliated with any particular stream of Judaism; the core group of organizers represented all denominations, said Ginsberg McEwan.

The project recently offered its third eight-week session on Jewish healing at Holy Blossom, facilitated by Rabbi John Moscowitz and teacher Michelle Katz. A previous series was held at Beth Tzedec Congregation with Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl and psychologist Elaine Cooper.

The current series has 17 people, the largest group thus far. Most of the participants have cancer or chronic illness, said Ginsberg McEwan. Participants represent a wide variety of age groups and include some spouses.

A typical session starts with music and continues with a reading, text study and visualization or meditation, said Katz. Often participants end with the Misheberach, the traditional prayer of healing.

"I hope that they will leave with a closeness to God, [a sense] that they are being cared for and that they are not alone in this," said Ginsberg McEwan. "I hope they can cope better and that when they're down, they can go to whatever text, ritual or meditation helped them during the group."

Ginsberg McEwan, retired director of social work at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, knows from her own experience that "there is more to healing than what medicine offers."

A survivor of childhood polio who now uses a wheelchair, she was diagnosed with and treated for breast cancer five years ago. Reading Rabbi Harold Kushner's book, When Bad Things Happen to Good People, helped her deal with the cancer.

"Everything became much clearer. I was not being singled out. Things just happen. That helped me."

Attending Shabbat services at Holy Blossom helps her to cope with what the week will bring, she said.

Katz hopes that people will leave the healing sessions with "some courage, some strength...maybe they can transcend their pain." The sessions, organizers stress, are intended to complement, not replace, traditional medical treatments.

Some participants have said they feel "more energized in terms of getting on a bit with life," said Ginsberg McEwan.

Organizers are looking into starting an ongoing group, for which a desire has been expressed, although logistics and funding have posed obstacles. "We're trying to do that, but it is difficult," said Ginsberg McEwan. "We'll probably start another group in late spring."

The Jewish healing movement started in San Francisco and has spread to several communities in the United States. To the best of Ginsberg McEwan's knowledge, the Toronto project is the only one of its kind in Canada.

Eyal Sartov. Totally Focused.

Eyal Sartov is Israel's number one tennis champion. His toughest shot is his forehand topspin from the baseline. 'Opponents fear it the most' he says. And there is his psychological strength, which he believes is 'a tennis player's most precious asset.

Sartov is a double amputee below his knees. In 1978, he stepped on a mine left over from the Six Day War in the Golan Heights. Being a tennis pro means hard work, an exceptionally high level of discipline and being totally focused. Sartov trains twice a day at the Beit Halochem Centre in Tel Aviv. He works out in the weight room almost 10 hours a week. He's on the court, in his special tennis wheelchair, with his coach, fine-tuning this cross court shots, perfecting his backhand, and enhancing that feared forehand topspin.

'In the Middle Ages, they used to lock up invalids in a room. Now we ski, climb mountains, parasail, waterski, go deep sea diving, windsurf and play tennis!. It's the most wonderful way to help the spirit triumph over the body.' says Sartov.

Hispanic community's Kahan proving to be a vital force

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Myrna Kahan

TORONTO — Ask anyone in Toronto's Hispanic community about Myrna Kahan and chances are they've heard of her.

Perhaps they know her from her days working at CHIN Radio, when she was host of a segment featuring personalities in the Latin community. Maybe they've seen her at a community event, representing her current employer Energy 108 Radio. Perhaps they remember her from the opening ceremonies at the CNE Air Show, which was sponsored by Energy 108 and which Kahan co-hosted. Or maybe they've seen her at the Limelight Dinner Theatre, where she co-emcees the current Tropi-Cuba extravaganza.

Anyway you look at it, the 38-year-old native of Puerto Rico is a going concern in the growing Hispanic community. Like many other Toronto Hispanics, she has energy, enthusiasm and a joie de vivre that's creating a growing profile in the wider community.

Kahan loves the limelight and she readily admits she's comfortable in the company of movie stars, recording artists, club owners and booking agents. She's always been that way, going back to the days in San Juan, Puerto Rico when as a fresh-faced 16-year-old, she persuaded the owner of a local glamor magazine to let her do freelance work — for free.

"I used to sit in the offices of radio and TV stations and meet the stars and make contacts," she said.

Through hard work and plenty of gumption, she worked her way into a position as one of the island's foremost entertainment reporters, working for Star magazine, the Puerto Rican equivalent of TV Guide. In addition, Kahan bagged a position as director of the communications department for the government of Puerto Rico, giving her even greater access to visiting celebrities and other movers and shakers.

After being hired by Gov. Carlos Romero Barcelo as director of protocol, Kahan seemed to have it made. But her life was to change in a big way. "I married an Israeli businessman and he thought it was a good idea for us to learn more English and to get exposure in the wider world," she said.

Fourteen years ago, they moved to Toronto for, they expected, one year. But her husband's construction business took off and "he convinced me to stay longer." When she became pregnant and had her baby, Jacob, Kahan began to look at Toronto as her permanent home.

Eager to get busy, she started her own business, preparing decorations for bnei/bnot mitzvah. Using lights and balloons for sculptural effects, something she learned in Puerto Rico but which was unique in Toronto, she developed a niche for her company, Favorite Occasions. She also taught decorating to Na'amat groups and learned English in the bargain.

Meanwhile, Kahan had decided to try to resume her career in the broadcast field, and she was able to get CHIN Radio to allow her to host a short segment on entertainment news. It also gave her the opportunity to develop contacts in the local Hispanic community.

"Myrna has made herself very well known in the community," said Eduardo Uruena, the Colombian-born, Jewish publisher of El Popular Hispanic Daily. She's present "as an entertainer or emcee at all the important functions and she's very outspoken and open. You know where you stand with her."

Two years ago, Kahan moved over to Energy 108, the city's number one dance music station, where she became a familiar figure at many station promotions.

She also took it upon herself to try to find outlets for the many talented, but unknown figures in the Latin community.

"The Latin community in the entertainment field wasn't very developed," she said. "There was little opportunity for the talent. I was involved in that field and I created different events where we can use that talent."

She introduced a local Chilean singer, Danielle, to the Napoli Festival in Italy. Recently, she and the director of the U.S.-based International Cultural Foundation organized a charity fashion show and Brazilian carnival that raised $60,000 for education scholarship for young Hispanics. And she helped organize a dance for the Canadian delegation at the Atlanta Olympics.

Currently, she's the co-host of the Tropi-Cuba Show at the Limelight Dinner Theatre at which Cuban expatriates, visiting Cubans and local musicians present a colorful Vegas-style spectacle.

Kahan said Canadians' appreciation of Latin music and dance has increased noticeably in recent years. It's probably because many Canadians travel to the tropics for winter vacation and become enchanted with the spirit and sensuality of the music and people, she said.

When Canadians come back from vacation, their feelings are reinforced when they hear superstars like Madonna sing in Spanish and they witness the popularity of Hispanic actors like Antonio Banderas. That makes them more accepting of Latin influences, she said.

So it shouldn't be too much of a surprise to see Latin clubs thriving in Toronto. LA Hollywood, where Kahan organizes the dance competitions, attracts more than 1,000 people for weekend Salsa nights, she pointed out.

An admitted "workaholic," Kahan said her career and her son "keep my hands full." She doesn't get back to Puerto Rico much, where her parents, originally from New York, many years ago opened a restaurant as "a business adventure."

ANNOUNCEMENT

On April 7, 1997, Orenstein & Partners became HORWATH ORENSTEIN. This change in name reflects our 6-year-old affiliation with Horwath International and our commitment to provide our clients with a strong network of people, skills and knowledge to grow their businesses successfully. The members of Horwath International include top quality accounting, international tax and management consulting firms in some 300 cities around the world.

During 71 years in business, our firm has gone through many transitions which have been reflected in our name. This presentation represents a summary chronology of that evolution.

It is with great pride that we have provided our clients and business associates with these many years of service. We thank you for your patronage and trust and look forward to continuing to serve you as HORWATH ORENSTEIN.

Horwath

Making a Name for Ourselves

In 1926, Nathan Perlmutter and Ben Papernick founded Perlmutter & Papernick, opening for business at 85 Richmond Street West, in downtown Toronto.

The partnership dissolved in 1932 and Nathan Perlmutter carried on the business as N. Perlmutter & Company, at 347 Bay Street.

Two years later, in 1934 Sam Orenstein joined N. Perlmutter & Company as an articling student. In the years that followed, he became an associate and then partner, prompting another firm name change in 1946 to Perlmutter, Orenstein & Company. In 1951, Perlmutter, Orenstein & Company moved to 220 Bay Street to accommodate growth.

In keeping with that growth, Harry Giddens and Gil Newman became partners. In 1957 the firm became known as Perlmutter, Orenstein, Giddens, Newman & Co. and relocated once again, to 121 Richmond Street West.

In 1966 after 40 years of service, Nathan Perlmutter retired. In 1981, Gil Newman withdrew from the partnership to work with a client.

The firm name remained unchanged until 1981, except for the period from 1965 to 1968 when the partnership was known as Perlmutter, Orenstein, Giddens, Newman & Kofman.

Recognizing the emerging global economy, the partnership affiliated with Witte Impey International in the late '70s and then in 1981, became part of a new worldwide affiliation with DFK International. The trend of the times, together with this new affiliation, prompted the 1981 name change to Orenstein & Partners. A year later, Orenstein & Partners moved to the Atrium on Bay, at 595 Bay Street.

After almost 50 years in practice, Sam Orenstein retired in 1983. Harry Giddens retired in 1991, having been a partner for almost 40 years.

In response to the increased cross-border business activity, Orenstein & Partners dissolved the affiliation with DFK International in 1991 and became a member of Horwath International, a wider-reaching network, to facilitate serving clients throughout the world.

On April 7, 1997, the firm became HORWATH ORENSTEIN to reflect the international status of the partnership and the affiliation with Horwath International.

Yom Hashoah marked at UWO

By ELANA LAVINE

LONDON, Ont. — Our recent Holocaust memorial event, Unto Every Person there is a Name, was one of the largest endeavors that the University of Western Ontario's Jewish Student Union has ever undertaken.

Since Yom Hashoah falls after our exam period is over, and the campus has emptied for summer, we decided to commemorate on an alternate date.

We set up a table, a microphone, an amplifier, and dozens and dozens of yahrzeit candles. For 24 hours straight, one by one, members, non-members, Jews and non-Jews, stepped up to the outdoor microphone and read aloud from computer generated printouts, the names of victims of the Holocaust.

Our vigil was publicized throughout campus and everyone from the president of the University Students' Council to faculty members took a turn reading out from the seemingly endless list. In 24 hours, we probably read aloud about 15,000 names, which is just a third of a percent of the six million Jews murdered under the Nazi regime. We became one voice, reading aloud a chronology of death and loss, one name at a time.

We stood, sat, crouched, hung around the microphone, supporting our friends, staying together, some of us even staying outside for the entire night. Many people walked by. Some stopped to ask us what we were doing, and even took a turn reading out the names of our ancestors. The names sounded awkward and tangled in the mouths of people who could trace their families back seven generations, but those who offered to read made our hearts soar in the hope that we were accomplishing something. There were also some who walked by quickly, only darting glances at us, feeling either uncomfortable or angry at our presence.

An Arab friend of mine involved with a Middle Eastern cultural group at school was sitting at a bench nearby. I went over to him to explain what was going on, and to offer him a chance to read. He looked up at me, looked back down at the bench and seemed torn. His words came out haltingly, as we walked over to the microphone.

"I'll buy a candle," he said, and paid his money for the small glass of wax, which he crouched to light in the wind-sheltered space behind a bench. I crouched down beside him, waiting for him to say something more.

"I...can't..., I can't read. There are people who will target me..." I kept quiet, still waiting. "Oh, damn it," he said, a different expression crossing his face, "I don't care, I'll read."

We stood up, and then, as suddenly as it had come into flame, his courage seemed to falter. I told him it was all right, and thanked him for lighting the candle. His face twisted into a painful apologetic smile, his eyes avoided mine and he left his candle with the others and walked back to his bench and his books.

It seems to me that there is a spreading, festering opinion that Jews no longer have a right to evoke sympathy for our loss in the Holocaust. Because of all the tension and bloodshed occurring in present-day Israel, we have crossed some kind of a line which has cost us our distinction as victims. We are no longer to be pitied for the tortures to which we were subjected 50 years ago, because of the present "crimes" we are accused of committing in our homeland.

My friend exemplified those who instinctively feel sympathy. He watched us read out the names of our grandparents and great-grandparents, and the names of those whose grandchildren would be standing with us had they been spared. He looked at my face and saw my sincerity, and yet he could not stand with me and perform an act which would have declared his acceptance of our pain as legitimate.

I wish he had finished his sentence. "People would target me...," he began, and I wonder who those people are. I wonder if they would condemn him for standing among Jews and reading out the names of other Jews, while Jews are an obstacle to be driven into the sea. I wonder if they would glare at him, and deny him the right to make his own decision about what events "cancel out" the significance of other events. I must walk by those people every day at school, and yet I'll never know who the majority of them are because we will probably never speak about such issues.

The majority of people I speak with, Jewish or non-Jewish, know nothing of schoolgirls on a field trip being shot down by a guard or women in a cafe being killed as they sat enjoying a Tel Aviv day.

University can be a womb into which students retreat beyond the reach of headlines, and certainly beyond those events that don't even make headlines. However, there are people who know nothing, but absorb from others the distaste for the plight of the Jewish victim and the scorn for Jews standing in front of a microphone and asking for a moment of sympathy.

Since 1986, The Answer Salon has specialized in ladies' designer fashions, sizes 14 to 24. Here you see a varied mix of corporate suitings, casual wear for weekends or "dress down Fridays", golf and aerobic wear and special-occasion clothes. An excellent selection of separate jackets, skirts, pants & tops to mix and match is also available.

There are designs from Europe (Steilmann, Grazia knits, Hucke, Tru, Hammer), the USA (Andrea Jovine, Ellen Tracy, Jones New York, Elisabeth by Liz Claiborne), and Canada (Marilyn Brooks, Jax, and Rebel Jeans).

The service matches the quality and variety of merchandise. Pleasing you, the customer, is essential to the repeat business The Answer Salon takes pride in. This means paying close attention to your wants, so that you not only come back, but bring your friends and relatives.

The Answer Salon's Spring Palette features accents such as blouses and silk T's in hot spring colours like kiwi and orange. Besides other hot hues like fuchsia, bright yellows and corals, there are softer tints of yellow, turquoise and green; natural beiges, taupes and creams; and classic colours like navy, black, white and red.

In spring styles, there is something for everyone. Try on the new flat-front narrow pants — or, if you prefer, the full, pleated styles. There are also A-line and straight skirts in prints and solid colours. and there is a wealth of fabrics to choose from: silks, linens, cottons and tencel, to name a few.

Tempted? The Answer Salon is at 3200 Yonge St., north of Lawrence; drop in, or call 416-483-5663.

Mother's Day

Let your footwear fantasies take flight!

The search is over ... women no longer have to spend endless hours looking for shoes to complete that special look!

Celebration Shoes creates unrivalled and uniquely distinctive shoes for the truly special occasion.

Beginning with shoes imported from London, Paris or Milan, finished in natural or hand-embroidered silk, satin, peau, shantung or exquisite gold brocade, our exclusive collection of footwear can be customized to match any bridal gown, cocktail suit, formal ensemble, party dress or casual wear.

Celebration will tint or colour-match and hand-decorate their shoes or boots with Nottingham lace, silk flowers, ribbons, velvet, bows or pearls — resulting in a perfectly co-ordinated look to capture your own individuality and ensuring that you will never appear as a carbon copy of someone else.

Our modern interpretations of classic styles are for women seeking primarily comfort, simplicity, originality, wearability and fantasy!

Weddings, galas, proms or celebrations ... when that special occasion requires the best ... call Celebration Shoes for an appointment at (416) 703-2789 and "let your footwear fantasies take flight".

UV rays also have positive effects for your skin, too!!

We all have read or heard about how bad the sun is for your skin. The media have always been influenced by companies with high advertising budgets. Large cosmetic companies (we all know) who produce bronzers and self tanners spend hefty amounts on advertising them in fashion magazines, TV, radio, etc.

The hysteria the media has created about the sun's rays is completely overstated. Many recent studies have shown how the sun can be beneficial to people suffering from fatigue, psoriasis, SAD (winter blues) and not also to mention the huge psychological and physiological advantages. This brings us to Heliotherapy, the positive effects of the sun I recently discovered during my investigations at Toronto's most authoritative indoor tanning chain CLUB TAN. With 6 locations it seems people are coming back to tanning in large numbers in the Toronto area as salons such as CLUB TAN really feel it is important to educate their clients.

When I chatted with owner Marshall Gottlieb, he informed me that since there isn't any regulatory body governing salons in Canada, he said it is very necessary to choose the right salon where they have the best and most up to date equipment as the industry is constantly evolving with safer beds. Marshall comforted me in letting me know his salons have the latest in safety and equipment using tanning beds that are fully climate controlled within a controlled environment. I witnessed a large 16 minute bed as well as facial tanners and this unique stand-up styled tanning capsule. I don't know about you, but when it comes to my body, I wanted to make sure I used the best salon out there as you can't really put a price on safety of your health. They prescribed a professional tanning schedule for the time before and after my vacation right through the summer according to the condition of my skin, objectives and budget. With more than $1 million invested into knowing their business, it is no wonder they are a successful and growing company for years to come.

Thanks to Marshall and his informative staff.

A. Goldstein

Happy Mother's Day Ellie! — from Marshall, Connie, Frank and Lucas

Medici makes you feel and look younger

Do you want to improve both your appearance and your wellbeing — not just to bring out your natural beauty, but to feel younger inside? Decisions about beauty care are important, and affect your whole being. Wouldn't you rather make them in a comfortable, reassuring atmosphere, where you enjoy access to the best professional knowledge available?

For comprehensive beauty care, including everything from traditional facials, pedicures and manicures to the latest technology, come to the Medici Cosmetic Surgery and Skin Care clinic. Staffed by qualified surgeons and professionals, Medici offers a friendly, reassuring setting, where you are treated like a unique individual, and time is taken to plan the beauty program best suited to you.

Medici offers liposuction for fat removal, using tumescent technique or the latest ultrasound method. Glycolic peels, using natural acids found in fruits, sugarcane and sour milk, will minimize fine lines; these treatments are also good for oily or acne-prone skin. Medici offers breast enhancement for fuller, firmer breasts with saline implants (water and salt). For a more sensual lip — both the temporary collagen treatment, and permanent enlargement which uses your own body fat.

Permanent hair removal is available, using the laser or TE system; this is not only more effective than traditional electrolysis, but also free from needles and pain. Other services include mole removal and varicose vein treatment by injection.

Medici is located at 7700 Bathurst St., just outside the Promenade Mall. For comprehensive beauty care call 905-764-7444, and ask for Lori or Joanna.

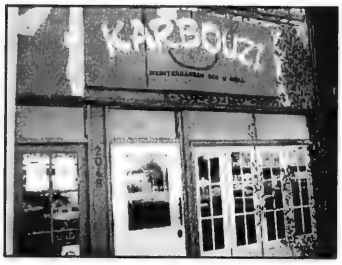
KARBOUZI



Karbouzi, a family business operating since 1970, has a well-earned reputation for authentic Greek food in a casual setting. For hearty fare, try spanakopita, moussaka or chicken souvlaki dinner. If friday's prime rib tempts you, though, come early: it's often gone by nine o'clock. If you fancy something lighter, choose from 20 cold and hot mezedes (appetizers for those who enjoy sharing with friends). Everything here is home-made, including the desserts. Enjoy lunch or dinner amid Mediterranean pastels, and stucco walls adorned with antique artefacts; upstairs, you'll find a stool bar with pool table and wide-screen TV.

MAMMA'S TRATTORIA

Mamma's traditional pastas are excellent; and the thin-crust pizzas have been voted North York's best for the fourth consecutive year. Especially tempting is a seafood pasta (mussels, clams, shrimps and squid) with white wine and a little tomato sauce; the pasta is partly cooked in water, then wrapped in parchment paper and oven-baked so the juices soak into the linguine. Pizza toppings range from standard to gourmet items like artichokes, grilled eggplant and sun-dried tomatoes. Mama's means home-style food made with fresh produce, in a relaxed, smoke-free atmosphere; take-out and delivery are available.

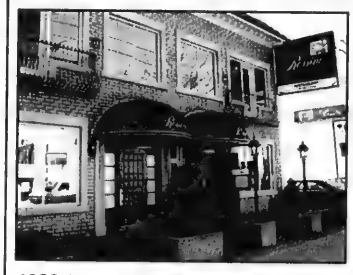
Rossini Italian Restaurant



For 28 years, Rossini has been enticing satisfied diners back from as far away as Barrie. All dishes are Italian, reminiscent of the Mediterranean coast, with a strong accent on seafood. For an appetizer, try Antipasto di Mare; for a main dish, Shrimp al Vino; or you may be tempted by the selection of pastas, pizzas, meat and chicken. There are 200 wines, white and red, many of them private stock. Rossini is spacious, with comfortable chairs and carpeting - and has recently undergone a complete renovation, inside and outside, with fresh colors to enhance the friendly atmosphere. There is free parking for patrons.

Community agencies calm following record blizzard

By MATT BELLAN
The Jewish Post & News

Area residents now braced against possible flood

WINNIPEG — At the Sharon Home, staff already on duty served shifts of up to 36 hours, and slept on mattresses on the auditorium floor.

That's just one example of how Winnipeg's Jewish community responded to last month's blizzard that dumped nearly a foot and a half of snow.

Staff at the Sharon Home, Winnipeg's Jewish nursing home, were "absolutely outstanding" during the blizzard, said Daniel Ruth, chief executive officer.

"Some worked 24 to 36 hours," he noted, adding that the home used its "disaster plan" in response to the storm.

Under the plan, staff members aren't allowed to leave until enough replacement staff arrive.

Ruth was sure, however, that staff would have stayed and worked even without that directive. "They were incredible," he said. "Everybody worked as a team." The home had only about half its usual staff numbers for those two days.

Relatives of some residents and some staff members picked up staff members at home whenever they could, and brought them to work.

"Another volunteer — we don't know who he was — went out and brought in six or seven people."

For Bob Yaffe, executive director of the YMHA Jewish Community Centre, the blizzard capped 14 months of what he hopes is some of the worst weather he'll have to endure in Winnipeg.

"I started here Feb. 1, 1996, when it was 42 below," he said. "The next day, the water mains broke in the Y Centre building."

He expressed concern about emergency provisions for the Asper Jewish Community Centre which is slated to officially open later this year.

As far as he knows, no such arrangements are yet in place for the new complex, which will house three schools, a Jewish community centre and other facilities.

"What if the centre doesn't close (because of a blizzard or other emergency), but the school does?" he wondered.

For Rabbi Avrohom Altein, head of Winnipeg's Lubavitch Centre, the blizzard was a "blessing."

"You're trapped in your house," Altein explained. "So what can you do? We had more time to prepare for Pesach."

THE PINEAPPLE INN

The Pineapple Inn, in an old Unionville church built in 1847, has its name from the carved or painted pineapple, the Colonial symbol of hospitality. The pineapple still decorates the walls of the Inn, whose inner appearance resembles a Victorian house with fireplace and pine floors. The Inn offers fine dining, and a menu which respects current trends in dishes like roast rack of lamb, peppered fillet of salmon, or puree of butternut squash soup with ale and cheddar cheese. The atmosphere is casual, hospitable and unpretentious. Come see for yourself: drop in for Sunday brunch; or reserve a room for an intimate dinner party.

Former lawyer now resolves family disputes

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — In Robert (Bob) Eisen's professional life, one challenge leads to another.

Eisen, 69, who was called to the bar at Osgoode Hall Law School more than four decades ago, recently turned his efforts to Alternative Dispute Resolution (ADR) for families, a field he says that is growing at an overwhelming pace.

"Too many families experience business break-ups or dwindling inheritances as a result of dissension among family members," says Eisen.

"Emotions stand in the way of clear thinking and decisions are driven by feelings rather than well thought-out criteria."

This is where Eisen and other ADR facilitators assist family members to recognize that faulty communication leads to emotional trauma and poor business decisions.

"We try to clear the channels of communication so that the participants may start speaking openly and directly on business matters free of the emotional baggage that held them back in the past."

He stresses it is important to separate emotions from financial issues.

Eisen says dispute resolution is a fast growing area, as people realize that litigation has become expensive and binding arbitration is cumbersome and drawn out.

"Mediation and facilitation, which get people to communicate and come up with their own compromises and solutions, are proving to be viable alternatives."

Eisen is certified by the Arbitrators Institute of Canada and has completed many courses in mediation and estate planning.

Eisen left his practice 16 years ago, when he accepted a position with the Environmental Assessment Board and then with the Ontario Municipal Board. He has served on a variety of commissions of inquiry handling dispute resolution.

Robert Eisen

"Many accountants and lawyers have clients who are faced with family conflicts. They are not trained to handle these situations and if they did, they may find themselves in a conflict of interest."

Eisen said he tries to create an atmosphere where those involved feel comfortable enough to speak their minds and become open to suggestions from others without dismissing them before considering the pros and cons.

Clients must sign an agreement that clarifies Eisen's position as well as theirs, with an understanding that he is not acting as a lawyer and that he will not make decisions for them.

Then they try to separate the issues and focus on them one at a time, while Eisen helps them set priorities. "Often, I have to bring them back to the main issues while together we examine their options."

Comedian proves there's more to comedy than simple one-liners

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Comedians who believe one-liners are a way to an audience's heart can take a lesson from 71-year-old Bernard Mendelovitch, who recently held a sold-out audience of 500 spellbound for 20 minutes as he told two stories by Shalom Aleichem.

Mendelovitch proved that the attention span can be extended when the human voice — he read several stories, primarily in Yiddish, but also in English — is as expressive as any musical instrument.

Mixing shorter stories — the old Jew in a London wartime blackout who is arrested on the street by a policeman for no other reason than that he wanted company on the way to the station — with longer pieces, the British actor showed exquisite timing in his Toronto debut.

Sponsored by the Friends of Yiddish and Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation, the concert was in memory of Ben Clodman, a raconteur and Yiddish teacher par excellence. Nina Shapilsky was the accompanist.

The audience identified completely with the mellifluous English accent of the veteran comic who turned a paean to the glories of Yiddish theatre into a memorable evening.

His particular genius is in recognizing that true Yiddish theatre has the bittersweet character of an aching heart as well as the humor of adversity. His story about the Jew who couldn't get his teeth fixed because his three prosperous doctor sons were all too busy with their own lives certainly struck a chord. His good-natured barbs at the fancy-shmancy weddings and parties of the 1990s found their mark.

As a trouper on the stage in east-end London, Mendelovitch recalled his pleasure at seeing a woman in the front row twitch with pleasure every time he told a joke. Later he found out that the spotlights shining on the woman's shoulders were giving her relief from rheumatism.

Then there was the story about the nurse telling another nurse, admiringly, that the Jewish patient donning t'fillin had already learned to take his own blood pressure.

Focus on wellness at Tulip's Aesthetic Studio

When you're too busy — with work, family commitments, even social life — it's easy to neglect your health. Moreover, because constant hurry and worry create mental and physical stress, it's easy to damage your health as well. You may not recognize stress, however, until you suffer its effects: headaches, stiffness, digestive disorders, anxiety and pain.

"Therapeutic massage," says Ron Mulesa of Tulip's Aesthetic Studio, "can break the cycle of stress and create a focus of wellness." Massage is a drug-free treatment, effective in stress reduction, relief of back or neck pain, headaches, sprains, muscle spasms, strain (including repetitive strain injury), whiplash, torticollis, arthritis, constipation and menstrual pains.

Therapeutic massage relaxes muscles and joints, increases tissue health, decreases retention of fluids and metabolic wastes, decreases stress, improves posture, flexibility and range of motion — and makes you more aware of your body, thus making it easier to care for yourself. And to benefit from massage, you don't have to have a problem: all you need is a desire for this awareness.

Ron Mulesa is a Registered Massage Therapist, with solid education and 7 years experience in sports therapy and recently therapeutic massage. He is accredited by the College of Massage Therapists of Ontario, and certified as a health care professional under the Regulated Health Professionals Act.

Tulip's offers you a comfortable, private setting, with a professional yet personal staff. Here, taking care of your health will be an enjoyable experience, tailored to your needs and preferences. Tulip's is in the Bayview Hills Plaza (Longo's) in Thornhill, at 7355 Bayview Avenue, Suite 201. Drop by; or call 905-709-1598.

B'not mitzvah service held in the Okanagan

OKANAGAN, B.C. — In the heart of the British Columbia Interior, the Okanagan Valley has a tiny but growing Jewish community, which is increasing not only its numbers, but also its commitment to opening avenues through which its members can identify and express themselves as Jews.

The members decided to hold a community b'not mitzvah service for women past the traditional age of bat mitzvah, an idea endorsed by the Okanagan Jewish Community/Beth Shalom Synagogue.

Nine women ranging in age from 14 to 67 began (with more than a little trepidation) the process of studying together to prepare for being called to the Torah. Since the community has no rabbi, the male members of the congregation who generally lead Shabbat and High Holy Day services assisted by teaching and guiding as needed.

The joy of learning together in a forum where care and support are offered has made this an experience of a lifetime, the b'not mitzvah have said. The usual boundaries separating the young and the "not so young" quickly dissolved as these nine women delighted in witnessing each other's progress.

On May 24, the b'not mitzvah will stand together, as nine proud women wearing their tallesim and kippot, and will be called to the Torah to take their place in their community as they affirm their Jewish heritage.

The b'not mitzvah of the Okanagan Jewish Community are: Olga Birney, Shelley Malkin, Linda Ruby, Gloria Golbey, Anita Nadler, Irmgard Tirschler, Shawna Kotler, Alicia Ruby and Linda van Wilde Rode.

Multiculturalism minister to report on hate crimes meeting

OTTAWA — Secretary of State for Multiculturalism Hedy Fry says she will issue a report within the next 30 days on a recent meeting called to discuss hate and bias crimes.

The meeting brought together a broad spectrum of ethno-cultural and religious groups, including B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, to examine hate crimes and the conditions which underlie them.

The Hate and Bias Activity and Crime Meeting addressed three themes: legislative and policy matters; community development and social issues; and technology and international issues.

According to a statement from the ministry, discussions "identified the need to approach the issues from a holistic perspective aimed at promoting a respectful and inclusive society."

The conference took place only days after Fry unveiled a new multiculturalism program, with new funding criteria and objectives.

The policy, announced last fall, is linked to three goals: social justice, civic participation and identity.

Congress launches its own Web site

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — What better way for the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) — 77 years into its existence — to get in gear for the 21st century than by joining the ranks of online Jewish cyberspace sites?

That's exactly what happened recently as CJC officially launched its own bilingual and interactive Web site, a project of CJC's National Archives Department.

At a special evening devoted to launching the site — located at [www.cjc.ca] — national archives director Janice Rosen pointed to perhaps its most unique aspect, which you won't see on the screen: the site was developed in-house by the archives department's own "Webmaster" Bonnie Borenstein.

Rosen and Borenstein, who "walked" the audience through the site projected on a screen, made it all seem deceptively simple.

Divided into six logical categories — What We Do, Where We Are, Our Aims, Our History, Communiqués and CJC News — at a touch of the mouse, the site will give anyone looking in from anywhere in the world access to a colorful, clean-looking, and well-organized site distributed over 200 "pages."

According to an information sheet prepared by CJC, hit the large "What We Do" button, and you get just that, a description of what CJC does and that includes hyperlinks to pages detailing CJC's "special interests and committees...and latest activities," such as on the War Crimes issue, in which the user could be hyperlinked to the most recent CJC communiqué or other relevant pieces of information on the war crimes dossier.

There are other attractions as well.

Besides providing continuously updated "news" on CJC activities, press releases and an online version of CJC's quarterly publication, DAIS (available through the What's New button), the site has separate pages devoted to CJC regions and features an interactive discussion group for member of Canada's small Jewish communities, where messages can be posted and responded to.

The site is also linked to the Archives Department pages, where users can check out CJC's guide to its collection. On the Web site information sheet, it was noted that the archives has gotten more e-mail requests for information in the first two months of 1997 than it did all last year.

According to Rosen, the site is primarily intended for individuals "involved" with CJC, researchers, as well as the general public, and will include an increasing number of links to related Web sites.

And as evening participant Marsha Lustigam noted, those numbers can add up.

Lustigman, who is librarian at Bialik High School, also gave a brief "tour" of Jewish sites on the Internet, noting that they now number more than 1,000.

Na'amat honors Winnipeg's Jewish Child & Family Service

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For possibly the first time in the history of Winnipeg's Jewish community, one organization has honored another.

On April 13, Na'amat Winnipeg recognized the work of Jewish Child & Family Service (JC&FS) at an evening entitled Growing Up With Na'amat.

"We felt that our work in Israel today is similar to the work Jewish Child & Family Service does here," says Pauline Goldstone, president of Na'amat Winnipeg. "Na'amat's main project right now in Israel is a new counselling service in Tel Aviv for abused mothers and children."

Na'amat presented JC&FS with a plaque in honor of its work. "They spoke very highly of the agency," says Merrill Shwaid, a longtime staff member and editor of Sherut, the JC&FS bulletin. "They are talking to us about joint ventures."

A second highlight of the evening was a concert by Russian Jewish teenage pianist Victoria Gomon. "We have had Victoria play at our annual meetings several times," Shwaid says. "She has really grown as a pianist." (Gomon has been studying in Vancouver for the past year.)

In other Winnipeg JC&FS news, interim director Emily Shane, who has been with the agency for 14 years, has been confirmed as the new executive director. She replaces Barney Yellen who left for a similar position in New Haven, Connecticut, last September.

Shane also serves on the board of the Manitoba Association of Social Workers and the Manitoba Association of Registered Social Workers.

"These are challenging times," she says. "We have to try to maintain our present levels of service despite decreased funding from all our major funders."

Shane is looking forward to the JC&FS move to the Asper Jewish Community Campus when it opens this summer. "The campus setting offers us the opportunity to further our efforts in providing optimum services for the Jewish community and the community at large," she says.

From Bach to Beatles: Questions nag at concert.

NORTH YORK — On reading Peter Breiner's publicity package in advance of his recent Canadian debut as conductor, pianist and arranger, I had several nagging questions.

Concert Review

A resident of North York since 1992, Breiner had planned a program with the North York Symphony featuring works by Mozart and Prokofiev, as well as Breiner's own arrangement of Beatles tunes "in the style of Bach." So — was this a "pops" concert? Was it to be, for lack of a better word, "serious"?

A list of recordings featuring the Czechoslovakian-born Breiner as arranger and conductor includes titles ranging from Tchaikovsky: Songs for Violin and Orchestra to Feelings and Elvis Goes Baroque.

Conducting from his seat at the harpsichord, Breiner opened the program with his Beatles Concerto Grosso. A six-part suite for flute solo and orchestra, its being written "in the style of Bach" is analogous to Velvita being processed as real cheese, and with the propulsive drive and intensity — not to mention genius — of neither Bach nor the Beatles, this hybrid falls squarely into the category of easy listening. The music may have appealed to many at the sold-out performance, but it's hard to imagine why it was part of a concert featuring a landmark piano concerto by Mozart, and Prokofiev's Classical Symphony, one of the most endearing works written this century.

The efforts of Milan Brunner, the flute soloist, were, unfortunately, not helped by the musicians with which he shared the stage. The North York Symphony is, in fact, a mixed group — about 35 of its roughly 55 members are professionals — that has gained a reputation as one of the finer regional ensembles in the province. Throughout the piece, though, the orchestra struggled with problems of balance and intonation.

If the Beatles Concerto Grosso brought into question Breiner's judgment in programming, his performance of Mozart's D-minor Piano Concerto dragged the evening one step further down the ladder of musical taste. A lot of head scratching and thumbing through programs must have gone on as Breiner introduced the piece with his own "improvisation."

Although Mozart didn't conceive the work with a piano introduction, the contemporary, Chick Corea-inspired piano styling of Breiner sounded as if it was from another planet. But it was not just here that Breiner took liberties with style. Pianists often replace the cadenzas written by Beethoven (Mozart didn't write any for this work) with their own, but the pastiche Breiner assembled for the first and third movement cadenzas — loungy jazz, tango, and an occasional nod to boogie woogie — had nothing to do with building on the music of Mozart and everything to do with the dumbing down of great art in an attempt to get a cheap laugh. Not my idea of symphony fun.

What is particularly sad is that Breiner has the pianistic technique and training to know better — although one wishes that he would have treated this most demonic of Mozart concertos with real passion.

The second half of the program began with Prokofiev's Overture on Hebrew Themes. The work dates from 1919, when the nine-member Zimro ensemble touring the United States handed Prokofiev a collection of Hebrew tunes and asked their former St. Petersburg Conservatory colleague to write them a piece. The result was a delightful but modest work that clocks in at only eight minutes, but the performance did little to convey the music's character.

It took the challenge of Prokofiev's Classical Symphony to show off the standard of playing that the orchestra is capable of. Here Breiner kept the tempo brisk and the orchestra rose to the occasion. The performance had all the requisite energy, and with good solo and ensemble playing, this music — buoyant, and comedic in tone — unfolded logically, and honestly, as it was meant to.

And that, Mr. Breiner, is what I call fun.

Toronto-born sculptor's work an Olympian choice

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Toronto-born kinetic sculptor Rein Triefeldt's spirit soared when his 3-foot bronze, Olympic High Flyer — two finely tuned male divers precisely balanced on a double support — was selected for display in the centre of Canada Olympic House during the 1996 Atlanta Summer Games. A favorite among visitors, the "flyers" spun through the air defying gravity at every touch.

The sculpture was on loan from owners Paul and Eleanor Paine of Windsor, Ont.

Triefeldt, who has been working and teaching at New Jersey's Johnson Atelier for the past 8½ years, holds a masters degree in Fine Arts from the University of Windsor. He also taught there and maintains a close association with his alma mater.

Following the Olympics, he exhibited successfully at the New Jersey State House and a clip from the show was included on the New Jersey Network TV evening news.

He has a special feeling for kinetic pieces, rising to the challenge of motion and exulting in its freedom.

An abiding concern for the environment is evident in his works, Condor's Nest and Whale.

Turning to a more whimsical subject, he is currently preparing preliminary drawings and watercolors for a new series of kinetic sculptures inspired by the Cirque du Soleil. Here he celebrates the daring flights and humor which distinguish this extraordinary circus.

The first of his completed "Cirque works," an acrobatic flyer and mystic moon in beautiful patina will have their debut in June at Two Sculptors, a gallery reminiscent of a French Salon, founded by two Canadians Jeffrey Rubinoff and Don Bonham, in New York's Chelsea district. The show features young New York sculptors and painters.

Artist Review

Triefeldt recently returned to Canada and the University of Windsor where his life-size sculpture, Flyer, a single intricately balanced diver, has become part of the university's permanent collection. A larger-than-life bronze sculpture has been commissioned by the developer PHP Management Ltd., for a new office building in Windsor and is now on the drawing board.

Another commission is for a monumental seahouse to be placed in a children's garden adjacent to the New Jersey State Aquarium.

Triefeldt's kinetic sculptures are in corporate and private collections in Canada, the United States, Hong Kong and the Netherlands.

A-G rejects claims of bias in Bar-On affair

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israeli Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein has rejected charges that ethnic or religious bias played a role in his decision to indict Aryeh Deri in connection with the Bar-On affair.

Rubinstein's statement last week marked his first public remarks since announcing his decision to indict the Shas leader for allegedly seeking the January appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general in exchange for a plea bargain in his own ongoing corruption trial.

Rubinstein and State Attorney Edna Arbel did not indict Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Justice Minister Tzachi Hanegbi or other top officials, citing lack of sufficient evidence.

Supporters of Deri, who heads the Shas party, held a mass rally in Jerusalem last week, where they charged that an anti-Sephardi bias had led to his indictment. (The backbone of Shas support comes from religious Jews of Sephardi background.)

At the rally, Deri accused the "Zionist establishment" of trying to subvert Sephardi culture.

Similar remarks were heard by other speakers at the rally, despite President Ezer Weizman's appeal to Shas not to blame the indictments on "the ethnic card."

Rubinstein said the evidence presented by police had provided the sole basis for his recommendations.

Rubinstein's remarks came in the wake of reports that in their final deliberations, he and Arbel had ignored three senior prosecutors who believed that there was sufficient evidence to indict Netanyahu and Hanegbi.

According to Israeli media reports, the three prosecutors outlined their view in a detailed 15-page internal document that said there was sufficient evidence to show that Netanyahu appointed Bar-On exclusively or mostly due to pressure from Deri.

Deri's lawyer said the three had also written that if indictments were not recommended against Netanyahu and Hanegbi, then none should be recommended against Deri, since such a move would appear questionable.

Rubinstein and Arbel have refused to release the internal document, which several groups have demanded in order to back up petitions they submitted to the High Court of Justice seeking to overturn the attorney general's decision not to indict Netanyahu and Hanegbi.

Bar-On won cabinet approval Jan. 10, but stepped down two days later amid growing charges in political and legal spheres that he lacked the experience to hold Israel's top legal post.

Two weeks later, the cabinet unanimously approved Rubinstein as Israel's attorney general.

A three-month police investigation was launched after an Israel Television report alleged that Bar-On was appointed as part of a deal to provide a plea bargain for Deri.

In a 995-page report submitted last week to Rubinstein and Arbel, police investigators had recommended that charges be brought against Netanyahu and Hanegbi.

Meanwhile, the political storm swirling around Netanyahu over the Bar-On affair appears for the most part to have subsided, with his government no longer facing the imminent threat of collapse.

Israel b'Aliyah and the Third Way parties each announced that they would remain in the coalition as long as measures were taken to ensure good government.

Coalition partners have been pressing for the removal of Hanegbi from the justice portfolio, saying that Rubinstein and Arbel had found grave improprieties in Hanegbi's handling of Bar-On's nomination and appointment.

Responding to demands by coalition partners that Netanyahu change the way his government functions, the prime minister announced last week that he was naming Finance Minister Dan Meridor of Likud and Trade Minister Natan Sharansky of Israel b'Aliyah to head a senior ministerial committee on civil servant appointments.

Shas party leader Aryeh Deri, right, is seen seeking advice last week from Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the party's spiritual leader. [RNS/Reuters]

Hamas activist vows to continue fight

By DOUGLAS DAVIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

LONDON — Prominent Hamas activist Abdel-Aziz Rantisi, now in Gaza after being freed from Beersheva Prison, has vowed to continue the fight against Israel and "send its militants to heaven."

Interviewed by correspondents from two London-based dailies, Saudi-owned al-Hayat and the Palestinian al-Quds al-Arabi, Rantisi said there was no room for a political agreement between Hamas and the Palestinian Authority (PA). While Hamas is guided by Islam, which "does not permit giving up one inch of Palestine," he said, the PA openly states it is willing "to relinquish around 90 percent of the land of Palestine."

Rantisi was the spokesperson for some 400 Hamas and Islamic Jihad supporters who were deported to Marjaz Zuhour in south Lebanon in late 1992. He was detained when he returned the following year.

Rantisi said he was unimpressed by the changes brought about by the 1993 Oslo Accord, telling al-Quds al-Arabi it was far from evident that anything had changed at all during his stay in prison.

He disputed a contention by his al-Hayat interviewer that Hamas had decided to halt military action and give the PA a chance to make progress in the negotiations with Israel: "This talk bears no relation to reality," he said, pointing to the recently discovered Tzurif cell. "I don't see that there has been a cessation of military action.

"Islam," he continued, "does not permit giving up one inch of Palestine and states that Palestine belongs to the Muslims, belongs to the Palestinian people, not to the Jews.

"Does Islam allow me to go along with the [PA's] conspiracy against the Palestinian people and the Palestinian cause and call this peace and coexist with it?

"When they speak of Oslo, they speak of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza with [eastern] Jerusalem as its capital while giving up the rest of Palestine."

Rantisi made similar remarks to al-Quds al-Arabi, adding: "My position is that I agree to the establishment of a Palestinian state on any [liberated] part of Palestine, but without giving up any part in exchange. This is liberation. Bartering land for land to which I am entitled is not liberation and it is not permissible in Islam."

Israelis nonplussed by debate over pending conversion bill

By MICHELE CHABIN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Reform and Conservative Jews in North America have been up in arms over Israel's pending conversion bill.

But many Israelis are essentially indifferent to both the legislation and to the Reform and Conservative movements in general.

Backgrounder

The bill "really isn't important to me or to most of the people I know," says Eyal Biger, a 26-year-old graduate student.

"Frankly, there are more vital things to worry about at the moment. Things like security and the peace process. Compared to this, the issue of conversion is a non-issue."

The legislation would give the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate exclusive control over conversions performed in Israel, in effect barring the recognition of Reform and Conservative conversions performed there.

The Knesset passed the measure earlier this month in the first of three votes known as readings.

The bill is now on legislative hold as government mediators seek a compromise between the Orthodox and non-Orthodox streams of Judaism.

Biger and his Danish-born wife, a practicing Hindu, whom he met during a trip to India, do not object to the Orthodox Rabbinate's long-standing monopoly on marriages, divorces and conversions performed in Israel.

"My wife doesn't plan to convert, but if she ever changes her mind, I hope she will do so within a religious framework," says Biger.

"In that case, I would like her to sit for half a year and study Judaism. I don't object to the beautiful, real way to convert," he said, referring to Orthodoxy. "But as I said, the issue isn't that important."

Unlike many Israelis, who have never experienced Judaism from a Reform or Conservative perspective, Biger personally knows many Conservative Jews.

"I'm familiar with Conservative Judaism — about half the people in my army unit belonged to the movement — but I just don't abide by their approach.

"If I go to synagogue, and I admit that's not often, I go to an Orthodox one and recite Orthodox prayers. I can't relate to movements that permit people to drive to synagogue or to smoke in one."

The Reform and Conservative movements' "obvious role in keeping North American Jews connected to Judaism," says Biger, "are right for America but unnecessary in Israel."

Biger's opinions are shared by large numbers of Israelis — point to the very real differences between Israelis and Diaspora Jews, according to those involved in religious pluralism issues.

And until these differences are addressed, they say, the gaps between Israeli and Diaspora Jews will grow even wider.

"American Jews must understand that religious pluralism in Israel is different," says David Clayman, director of the American Jewish Congress office in Israel.

"For most Israelis, religious pluralism means their right to pick and choose what they will observe of the tradition, but the tradition itself, in their view, should remain the Orthodox one.

"Prof. Shlomo Avineri of the Hebrew University said it very succinctly: 'The shul that I don't go to is Orthodox.'"

While Reform and Conservative Jews in North America see their struggle for recognition in Israel as part of a broader fight to overcome what they perceive as religious coercion in Israel, most Israelis view things differently.

According to Clayman, the majority of Israelis do not view the non-Orthodox movements as their salvation from the Rabbinate's control over marriages and conversions, or even from such controversies as Shabbat street closures or bans on non-kosher meat.

"If anything, Israelis aren't seeking alternate religious forms," says Clayman. "What they're seeking are non-religious civil ceremonies for marriage, divorce, burial, conversion.

"There's more pressure in Israel to institute civil marriage and to establish civil cemeteries than to recognize the authority of Reform and Conservative rabbis."

Care about their own lives

Ithamar Gruenwald, professor of Jewish philosophy at Tel Aviv University, maintains that Israelis' relative lack of interest in the conversion bill is actually quite natural.

While American Jews are not too upset about the controversy over closing Bar Ilan Street in Jerusalem on Shabbat, "most Israelis aren't too concerned about the conversion bill, since it doesn't affect most of them in any significant way," says Gruenwald.

"Really, what people ultimately care about are things affecting their own lives."

Reform movement spokesperson Anat Galili says Israelis "have a total misunderstanding about American attitudes toward Judaism, and that's where the gap on the conversion law comes into play."

"Growing up in Israel, you don't have to do anything to feel Jewish. Everyone knows about Pesach and Yom Kippur because everything is closed or we learned about them in school. Israelis don't realize that Jews in a non-Jewish environment must do something every single day to assert their Jewishness.

"And just as Israelis take their Jewishness for granted," Galili says, "Americans take the separation between church and state, the concept of religious pluralism, for granted. To Israelis these are foreign concepts."

Rabbi Einat Ramon, spokesperson for the Conservative/Masorti movement in Israel, believes that Israelis" traditional lack of enthusiasm for non-Orthodox Jewish streams stems more from ignorance than indifference and that local interest in the movements is actually starting to grow.

"When the conversion bill passed its first reading in the Knesset, Israelis didn't really understand what it all meant," says Ramon.

"Then, all of a sudden, the journalists starting calling and the newspapers were full of articles and opinion pieces, and people started calling the talk shows.

"Slowly, the conversion issue and its implications for religious pluralism in general have begun to enter the Israeli consciousness."

Ramon is optimistic that the Conservative and Reform movements will ultimately find their niche in Israeli society.

But for now she acknowledges that "Israelis have very little energy for anything not related to peace. That goes for women's issues, for poverty issues, for religious pluralism. That's one reason we are marginalized."

Another problem, Ramon says, is the negative image many Israelis hold of the non-Orthodox streams.

"There's a great deal of misinformation in the community, in school textbooks, or the textbooks ignore us completely. Often, children are told that non-Orthodox Judaism is anti-Zionist.

"Until the last government, the State of Israel never supported us, financially or otherwise, and the money the Religious Affairs Ministry earmarked for us for 1996 still hasn't materialized. There is a great deal of antagonism coming from the government," Ramon says.

Still, Galili maintains that there is growing interest among Israelis in the non-Orthodox streams.

"There are tens of thousands of people all over Israel who are interested in non-Orthodox movements," she says. "Every day we receive several phone calls from those who want to support our cause, and calls from those interested in a non-Orthodox marriage ceremony or conversion.

"It's taken quite a while, but people are listening."

The Week in Israel

April 21

• Some 7,500 vacationing Israelis crossed the border into Egypt, reversing the route of the exodus commemorated during Passover. Travel agents said 20 percent more Israelis are travelling abroad during the holiday period than during the same time last year.

April 22

• Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi and Supreme Court President Aharon Barak agreed to appoint Hebrew University law professor Yitzhak Engelard to replace Justice Zvi Tal who is retiring from the court. Engelard has been named to receive this year's Israel Prize for law.

April 23

• Israeli and Palestinian security forces resumed joint patrols in Bethlehem.

April 24

• The High Court of Justice overturned the decision to grant the Israel Prize for Journalism to Ma'ariv columnist Shmuel Schnitzer. The order was made in response to a petition by Labor Knesset member, Adisu Massala, who alleged that Schnitzer had written a racist article in 1994.

• Israel Television quoted air force officials as saying that MiG-29 fighter planes, considered Israel's primary air challenge, were sighted in Israeli skies this week. Officials said the planes were brought in from an unnamed country to test Israel's weapons systems. The MiG-29, built in the former Soviet Union, is used by a number of Arab states' air forces, including Syria and Iraq.

April 25

• The trial of an Israeli citizen, Azam Azam, opened in Cairo. Azam, a 35-year-old Druze from the Galilee, is charged with economic espionage on behalf of Israel. The charges carry a maximum sentence of 15 years in prison. Israel and the accused have repeatedly denied all of the accusations.

• A Lebanese woman and a Lebanese policeman were wounded during Hezbollah attacks on IDF and South Lebanese Army positions in south Lebanon.

Mideast Analysis

With the Bar-On influence peddling scandal buffeting Israel, Benjamin Netanyahu will probably move still farther to the right of the political spectrum to save his skin.

Despite a damning police report, Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein and State Attorney Edna Arbel decided not to indict the prime minister for fraud and breach of trust.

But Netanyahu was surely disappointed by their assertion that they had a "tangible suspicion" about the propriety of his role in the affair.

Their disclaimer, and the Labor party's demand that he should resign and call new elections, have weakened Netanyahu.

Since he cannot put the affair completely behind him, he remains uncomfortably beholden to political parties in his coalition that not only supported him throughout the crisis but that oppose the Oslo peace process or have serious reservations about it.

As well, since Labor party chieftain Shimon Peres is no longer interested in joining forces with the Likud, Netanyahu cannot use the threat of a national unity government to keep anti-Oslo rebels in line.

Prior to the latest developments, Netanyahu reportedly said that he could not proceed with the peace process because of the strong "rejectionist" elements in his government.

They had voted against the Jan. 15 Hebron accord and the first of three planned Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank. Netanyahu, therefore, seemed ready to edge closer to the centre by sharing power with the Labor party in a national unity government whose priority would be the successful completion of the peace process.

Netanyahu's stated commitment to the Oslo accords and his acceptance of partition, a principle which he had previously opposed, prompted some 20 hard-liners in his coalition to form the Land of Israel Front, spearheaded by Likud Knesset member Michael Kleiner.

Netanyahu's emerging centrist views also antagonized old Likudniks. Yitzhak Shamir, the former prime minister, charged that his actions were contrary to Likud principles. Tsila, his 84-year-old mother, told the Washington Post that she could not understand why her son was pursuing the "absurd idea" of making peace with the Arabs. Yisrael Harel, a leader of Jewish settlers in the territories, cast aspersions on his "loyalty to ideology" and "declared beliefs."

According to the Forward, a New York City weekly, Netanyahu's flirtation with centrist politics probably reached an apotheosis in February, when he invited a couple of fierce critics, but not several of his closest ideological friends and allies, to a private dinner at the Israeli Embassy in Washington.

When Netanyahu returned from the United States, he learned that Benny Begin — who had resigned from his cabinet after voting against the Hebron agreement — intended to submit a motion in parliament entitled Netanyahu is Dividing Jerusalem.

Begin was angry that Netanyahu had delayed approval of the Har Choma housing project in Jerusalem. Kleiner, meanwhile, threatened to topple his government in a Labor party no-confidence resolution unless he sent in the bulldozers to Har Choma.

Chastened by this pressure, Netanyahu began construction at Har Choma sooner than he wanted, perfectly aware that the project would trigger a negative and perhaps violent Palestinian response.

In the wake of the March 21 suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, Netanyahu hardened his conditions for resuming negotiations with the Palestine Authority (PA). But, realizing that his political positions had widened the gap between Israel and the PA, Netanyahu put out feelers to the Labor party for a national unity government to revitalize the peace process.

With the Bar-On affair still discombobulating Israel, this concept has been neutralized, as Netanyahu scrambles to appease hard-liners and shore up his support on the right.

Church leaders meet PM

By HAIM SHAPIRO
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — As thousands of Orthodox Christian pilgrims filled the Old City of Jerusalem in preparation for their Easter, the heads of the two major Orthodox churches together with a leading Roman Catholic, met Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to discuss a Moslem "incursion" into the holiest site in Christendom.

The Christian leaders, Greek Orthodox Patriarch Diodoros I; Armenian Partriach Torkom Manoogian; and Franciscan Custos of the Holy Land Joseph Nazzaro, had earlier written to Netanyahu to enlist his support. They complained that during renovations to the Hanqa Mosque adjacent to the Church of the Holy Sepulcher, the Wakf (the Moslem religious trust) had built a toilet above the roof of the church. In addition, the Wakf had broken into and appropriated two rooms in the Greek Orthodox patriarchate.

Netanyahu told the leaders that the government could not accept any change in the status quo in Jerusalem, and in particular the part of the Old City where the church and mosque are located.

Mimouna without mangal

The Mimouna was officially opened on Monday night in a new Moroccan-style building on the beach in Ashdod, with the participation of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and the chief rabbis. Amoyal said the port town had been chosen because it has a large concentration of Israelis of Moroccan origin and recently received large influxes of immigrants from Ethiopia and the former Soviet Union.

In Jerusalem, on Monday night, he said, there were six central locations for welcoming guests.

Meanwhile, for those for whom the Mimouna has become inalterably associated with grilling meat, there was modest entertainment at Sacher Park on Tuesday, Amoyal said.

Israel & the Jewish World

Jerusalem a symbol for both Jews and Arabs

short lived. The Jews accepted the November 1947 UN plan to treat Jerusalem as a corpus seperatum (essentially an international city), but the Arab rejection of partition and the invasion of Israel made this irrelevant. Shortly after Israel became independent in 1948, the Jordanian legion conquered all of the Old City of Jerusalem. The city was divided and survivors in the Jewish Quarter were forced into exile again.

Although the ceasefire agreement with Jordan provided for free access to Jerusalem's holy places, this was never honored. Jews were blocked from crossing the armistice line and going to the Western Wall, the 2,000 year-old remnant of the Second Temple and the holiest site in Judaism. Israelis could only get as far as Mt. Zion beyond the city walls and climb the tower to glimpse past the barbed wire and gun emplacements and into the Old City and the Jewish Quarter.

What they witnessed from this vantage point caused them tremendous anguish. The Arab occupiers permitted the systematic destruction of the Jewish Quarter. Every house, synagogue and Jewish institution was ruined. A road was plowed through the ancient Jewish cemetery on the Mount of Olives. Some 38,000 graves were defiled and the tombstones used to line a road to the new Intercontinental Hotel nearby. The area near the Western Wall was desecrated. All of this was documented, but the silence of the international community was deafening.

As a result, after the war, some Israelis urged military action to liberate the Jewish Quarter, but prime minister David Ben-Gurion rejected this option to avoid a wider conflict. However, in June 1967, after the war had started and the Jordanian army began firing on Israeli positions, Israel captured the Old City and reunited Jerusalem. The Arab residents expected the Israelis to exact revenge by destroying their homes and religious sites. However, defence minister Moshe Dayan sought to put an end to the conflict and even refrained from placing the israeli flag over the Dome of the Rock (built on the site of the Temples) and Al Aksa Mosque.

Dayan allowed the Islamic religious authorities to control the area, and to avoid friction, Jews are still prevented from praying on the Temple Mount. Churches and related holy sites are under full control of Christian authorities, and for the first time in 2,000 years, the followers of all three monotheistic religions are allowed free access to their holy places in and around Jerusalem.

Now, 30 years after its reunification, the political battle for Jerusalem has resumed. Yasser Arafat has called Israel's efforts to repair some of the damage and rebuild the synagogues and houses in the Jewish Quarter "the Judaization of Jerusalem" and "an affront to Islam."

Arafat's vision of Jerusalem's future is at complete variance with the national consensus among Jewish Israelis, which favors continued Israeli sovereignty over the unified city. Since 1967, the objective of Israeli policy has been first and foremost the prevention of the redivision of Jerusalem and another assault on the holiest sites of Judaism.

Underdog soccer team tries to stay in the big league

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Beit Shean is a small Israeli town situated in a hot, sweltering valley near the Jordanian border. It has a population of 14,000, mostly religious, lower-income people of Moroccan descent who immigrated in the 1960s. Israelis consider Beit Shean, a hell-hole — the "other" Israel.

But Beit Shean has something to prove. Their soccer team has defied the odds and been promoted to the national league — the big league. After a promising start including victories against big cities like Tel Aviv, Beit Shean's soccer team lost nine in a row, hasn't scored in five months and is in danger of finishing last.

Apart from the sheer humiliation, finishing last means getting relegated back to the minor leagues and "playing with the Arabs," as one fan says.

There are five more crucial games left. It's rare for such a small town to have a national team and with the town's pride at stake, the whole team feels the pressure. Will they win and show the big cities they can compete or will they lose and disappear back into anonymity?

Underdog (Bloor Cinema, May 3, 11:30 p.m. and May 5, 3 p.m., 85 minutes) showcases the stories behind the five final games. It is an exciting documentary that probes into Israel's religious divisions and societal expectations. It is more than just a soccer documentary.

Racism, for example, is rampant. When traveling to other towns, the players are taunted with "Dirty Moroccan" chants and the team's backup goalie believes he gets to sit on the bench the whole time because he's originally from Tel Aviv — an "outsider."

The first game is against Tel Aviv, one of the best teams in Israel. After holding them off to a scoreless tie, the ref adds an unusual four minutes of uncalled for extra "injury" time. Tel Aviv scores in the final second. The team is furious and say they've been discriminated against.

"It's a conspiracy to make us go down a league. What else do we have in this lousy town besides football?" one fan complains. Other fans show their hostility to the referee in a more overt manner, hurling the worst insults possible in this machismo-dominated culture: "The ref's a homo!"

Following yet another loss, goalie Meir Cohen looks at the scrapbook of clippings from magazines and newspaper articles about him. He's the closest thing to a star anyone from Beit Shean can aspire to. But now it's looking to fade. "If we fall to the minor league, everyone will forget Meir Cohen," he says grimly.

It comes down to one final must-win game against Haifa, one of the league's leaders. The odds are stacked against them. "Miracles do happen," one optimistic fan, a garbage collector, says. "It's like saying I will be prime minister some day. It can happen!" The nail-biting ending is a classic "bottom of the ninth, one down, two men out, bases loaded" scenario.

Even if you're not a soccer fan, the directors Doron Tsabari and Rino Tzror do such a wonderful job bringing the emotions of the sport and the people to you that you'll be clutching your seat rooting for the underdog to win.

A documentary of a different manner is A Tickle In the Heart.

Max, Willie and Julie Epstein are three elderly New York brothers now comfortably retired in Florida. At their prime in the 1950s, they were known as the Kings of Klezmer, one of the hottest klezmer acts in New York. They were booked solidly, sometimes doing three shows a day.

Now, with the revival of klezmer music, the brothers have dusted off their instruments and are at it again, taking their act on the road.

German director Stefan Schwietert follows the trio on the road to New York's Chassidic community, their ancestral home in Pinsk, and Berlin where they play to packed houses of young and old.

This is a documentary in the traditional style, with interviews and concert performances interspersed with slice-of-life scenes — one of the brothers arguing with his wife over how to make latkes for example.

Not as nail-biting as Underdog perhaps, but this trio are underdogs themselves and you feel pulled into the story with their heart-warming and funny anecdotes.

Willie Epstein is scheduled to appear at the screening which closes the Jewish Film Festival on May 8, 9 p.m. A Tickle In The Heart then opens at Canada Square Cinemas on May 9.

Max Epstein chats with the locals in his ancestral town of Pinsk in the film A Tickle In The Heart.

DOCUMENTARY EXPLORES POLITICS OF JERUSALEM

Jerusalem: An Occupation Set In Stone? is a scathing and deeply troubling indictment of Israel's treatment of Palestinians in and around Jerusalem since the Jewish state gained control of all sectors of the holy city in the 1967 Six Day War.

Those who love Israel will find this a difficult piece to watch, for it depicts Israelis as unlawful occupiers and rampant destroyers. The video opens with an Israeli bulldozer demolishing a Palestinian home and closes with another bulldozer tearing down a centuries-old olive grove to make way for a superhighway.

In essence, the 58-minute documentary describes Israel's alleged campaign to expropriate large amounts of Palestinian-owned land in Jerusalem while bureaucratically excluding large numbers of Palestinians from living or building within municipal bounds. With seeming prescience, it even shows the Jerusalem City Council approving the controversial Har Choma housing project after the strident objections of two council members.

The video offers a parade of emotive speakers who present the Palestinian case in a powerful and compelling way. However, not one person was included to explain or attempt to defend Israel's side, even peripherally, and not one mention is made of terrorism or Israel's very genuine and paramount security concerns. To those seeking balance, such glaring omissions erode credibility.

Furthermore, regarding Har Choma, the video first accuses Israel of planning to consume "land desperately needed for Palestinian housing," then, contradictorally, of planning to destroy "one of the last green spaces in the south of the city." Which is it? Or is Israel to be vilified on every available pretext, no matter what it does? Such inconsistencies are the hallmarks of propaganda.

Despite its seeming flaws and hostility, however, the video is hard to dismiss. After watching it, I found myself freshly lamenting the tragic loss of Yitzhak Rabin, the shrewd warrior and man of peace who at least had a vision for leading his country from the present stalemated political morass.

Produced by the so-called Palestinian Housing Rights Movement, Jerusalem: An Occupation Set in Stone? was directed by Marty Rosenbluth, an American Jew who lived in the West Bank for seven years. Part of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, it's being screened May 4, 1 p.m. at the Bloor Street Cinema, with Rosenbluth in attendance.

Air Canada flights from Montreal to Tel Aviv possible by early next summer

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Air Canada will probably introduce non-stop flights between Montreal and Tel Aviv early next summer, initially offering twice weekly flights on 203-seat Boeing 767-300 jets, the company's president and chief executive officer Lamar Durrett confirmed at a Jewish Business Network (JBN) luncheon.

Air Canada had announced it would start its route to Israel this June but cancelled its plans in February after Quebec Superior Court halted the consolidation of all international scheduled flights from Mirabel to Dorval Airport, that was set for April 1. Quebec Court of Appeal overturned that decision earlier this month and the transfer is expected to completed by July.

"We've moved our flights to other routes since making the decision to delay in late February and it was not possible to go ahead this summer," he said.

Business Profile

Alan Silverstein

Toronto lawyer is director of Real Estate Council

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Alan Silverstein's 20-year career has led to his sitting on the board of a council that is bound to rejuvenate Ontario's real estate industry.

The Toronto lawyer who specializes in real estate and mortgage financing was recently appointed one of 12 directors of the new Real Estate Council of Ontario, a council which as of March 1, is responsible for the management and operation of the real estate industry.

Silverstein, a weekly real estate columnist for the Toronto Star, producer of the Royal Bank Mortgage Minute, a daily commentary broadcast on 67 radio stations across the country, and author of five books on the subject including Hidden Profits in Your Mortgage and The Perfect Mortgage, applauds Mike Harris for the recent move.

"The council, whose members represent consumers as well as the business and legal industries, is there to serve and protect the public. Because it will be run with consumer input, it will be a lot easier for people to get their concerns heard. Perhaps, complaints will be lodged with the council instead of with a member-run real estate board that is not obligated to give a public opinion. It will be removed from the hands of the industry and will not be bogged down by government bureaucracy."

Until now, he says, the industry has been regulated by the government. "It will still set the standards and regulations but the day to day operations will be delegated downwards. Areas such as licensing, bonding, continuing education and customer service will be left to us. [Harris] feels that it is not necessary to regulate every aspect of the industry itself. It's all part of downsizing the government and getting people off its payroll."

There are consumers, he said, at every meeting of the Law Society of Upper Canada. "These are lay benchers who are keen observers and can look at things in a different perspective than lawyers. This is very similar.

"It's exciting to be starting from ground zero. After so many years as a real estate lawyer I'm thrilled to have some input in how the industry is run. It has been pushing for this for 20 years. It shows an industry's maturity when it is capable of taking on self-management."

Silverstein's passion for helping consumers find their way around the real estate industry began in the early 1980s, he said, when interest rates were sky-rocketing and people were looking at ways to cut interest rates.

"I found out about credit unions in British Columbia that were offering weekly mortgages. I warned borrowers that they do not necessarily benefit just because a mortgage is paid faster than monthly — weekly, biweekly or semi-monthly; the key is how the amount payable is calculated. For a fast-pay mortgage to save money, one-quarter of the regular monthly payment should be paid each week, or one-half every two weeks. This accelerated payment can reduce the normal 25-year amortization by five years or more."

Before deciding on a weekly mortgage, he advises, shop for a monthly payment mortgage that is amortized over 25 years. "But before booking it, divide that payment by four or two, depending if payments are weekly or biweekly. What pops out of your calculator is the correct accelerated payment, the one that will save you tens of thousands of dollars in mortgage interest.

"I was giving people ways to reduce costs and I began getting quoted. One night, during the height of the high rates, I was a guest on CKEY's John Gilbert Show and people called in until 4 a.m. Everyone was looking for advice from someone other than a bank."

There is never a shortage of material for his weekly column or his radio spots, he says. "The real estate law is complex and people do not have enough information. There is no Home-Buying 101 and too often, people are flying by the seat of their pants. The key is for consumers to find out everything they can. I like to help them do that.

"Recently, for example, I read an article about a delay in the closing of new homes. I decided it was time to tell people what their rights and entitlements are if their closing is delayed. Too many people sign an amendment that allows for a change in the closing date."

Newly built homes have tremendous appeal, he says, and buyers can get good value buying from a builder — by including extras, options and upgrades in the price, plus deep discount mortgage financing. "But before you purchase a new home, be sold on the builder; investigate its reputation, its background and the quality of its work. Check with the local home builders association or provincial warranty program for information and don't be afraid to bang on doors and ask other buyers what they think of their builder."

If he does nothing else, Silverstein says, he would like to see people try and change the way things are typically done.

"If we can make things more convenient, why not? Keys, for example, are one of the first things that first-time buyers ask about. For resale homes, normally the keys change hands on closing at the registry office. To avoid having the keys make the long trek back, see if they can be left near the house — with a neighbor or the real estate agent — or if they can be obtained directly from the vendor. Imagine what time that will save when your family is anxious to move into their new home."

How many people know, he asks, that many resale offers now let buyers state by what time the deal must close and the seller vacate the house? Otherwise you risk paying extra hours for your mover while you wait for the seller to move out.

"These are little things but the bottom line is that they can help the consumer save money. Houses should provide more than just a place to live — people must look at them as an investment."

Basically, says Silverstein, "what I am doing is giving people information from which they can benefit. Currently, for instance, interest rates are at a historic low and better deals are always possible because banks and trust companies are willing to negotiate. All it takes is objective information from a reliable source. I always try to make things easier. I am not afraid of being criticized —I believe in what I say. A lot of real estate and mortgage laws are complex and could use changing but that does not mean that the public should suffer."

The new council is a "bold initiative on the government's part and it should help to get a lot of changes through. It's a great new challenge for me but I am definitely not giving up my day job. I am a full-time lawyer and always will be. I've found my niche."

IF YOU FIND LINEN AT A BETTER PRICE ANYWHERE ELSE

BUY IT

A lot of stores today offer a price guarantee. That means if you find a lower price anywhere else, they'll match it. So after running around to find a better price, all you're left with is the option to pay the same price somewhere else.

But isn't the best price what you're really looking for? Then shop at Deblins Linens. We don't match prices.

Our goal is to offer you the lowest price in the first place. Sure, you might find an odd item at a lower price in another store, but don't come rushing back to Deblins to pay the same price. Just buy it. We're confident that when you compare both quality and price, nine times out of ten you'll get the better deal at Deblins .... not just the same deal.

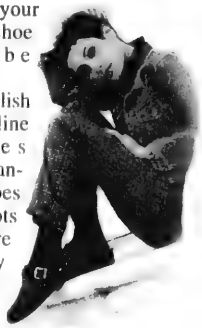
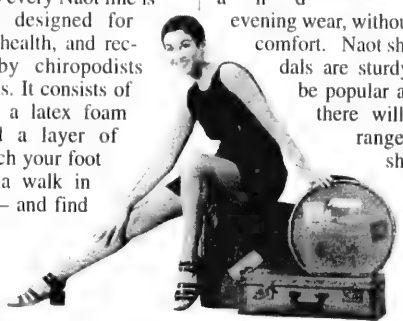
What's afoot for spring? Naot says style, comfort

Every day, you spend hours wearing shoes; and your feet, which bear all your weight when you move, are among the hardest-working parts of your body. If you want to treat your feet well, you should take a good, close look at quality footwear by Naot.

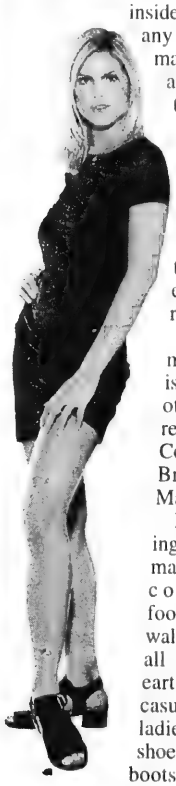
Corinne Lissoos and Sandy Galet have a lasting commitment to Naot, which makes the most popular sandal line in Israel. Their company, Solemates, is Naot's exclusive Canadian representative.

Common to every Naot line is the footbed, designed for comfort and health, and recommended by chiropodists and podiatrists. It consists of a cork base, a latex foam cushion, and a layer of suede on which your foot rests. Take a walk in these shoes — and find out how good you feel when you're kind to your hard-working feet.





Naot footwear can be worn inside or outside in any season. It is made with natural, water-resistant leathers, and the cork footbed insulates the foot to keep it cool in summer, warm in winter, so you enjoy year-round comfort.



Solemates' main business is wholesale, to other Canadian retailers such as Corso, Capezio, Brown's and Marquis.

Naot is widening its range to make durable, comfortable footwear for all walks of life, in all styles, from earthy through casual to dressy: ladies and men's shoes, sandals and boots, and kids' sandals and clogs. You can get your entire shoe wardrobe from Naot.

The stylish Metro line features heeled sandals, shoes and boots that are dressy enough for both work and evening wear, without sacrificing comfort. Naot shoes and sandals are sturdy enough to be popular at camp; and there will be a new range of men's shoes in the fall.

Solemates isn't satisfied with having a better product. A proper fit is essential to any shoe purchase, and Sandy and Corinne have always stressed to the retailers the importance of ensuring that each customer is fitted correctly.

Further information on Naot's product line can be obtained by calling their head office at (416) 650-5637. If you're calling from out of town, Solemates' toll-free number is 1-800-461-NAOT.

Now! Health insurance for your appliances. Why take chances?

For 14 years, Southern Atlantic Appliance Service has been providing a unique form of insurance to both home and condominium owners in Ontario. Robert and Errol Gordon founded the company in April of 1984, basing their idea on one which had been very successful in Florida for many years: a single insurance package for all makes and models of appliances. Until the father and son opened their business, no company in Toronto was offering such a package.

The Southern Atlantic Appliance Service Protection Plan works like other kinds of insurance. You avoid major repair bills and assure yourself of fast, dependable service by factory-trained technicians at no additional cost to you. For as little as $99 a year for 5 major appliances, or pennies a day, you can protect yourself against the high cost of repairs.

The Southern Atlantic Appliance Protection Plan covers all parts and labour required for maintaining the insured appliances in good operating condition. There is no limit to the number of repairs; and there are no charges for trips or pick-ups. You are guaranteed service within 24 hours of your call. Often, however, a technician will visit you on the same day.

Southern Atlantic technicians service any brand or model of appliance, so that no matter what makes you own, the one call to Southern is the only one you need to make. Southern Atlantic has also been authorized by Sub Zero, Thermador and other manufacturers to do warranty service. The company's technicians regularly attend schooling seminars in order to keep up with new technology in the appliance industry, and maintain their skills and efficiency at a high level. For non-members, Southern will make C.O.D. calls.

During the last few years, Southern Atlantic has expanded it's business to meet the needs of both their clients and the public by carrying a full line of top quality water filters for those concerned with maintaining the purity of their drinking water.

Southern Atlantic Appliance Service is a 100% Canadian-owned company, and member of the Better Business Bureau. In order to apply for your "Easy Peace of Mind" Protection Plan, don't hesitate to call: (905) 738-4076.

Family-run Furrier Provides 'Full-service' Care

Kahnert Furs on Avenue Road is a family-run business that has been serving the Greater Metropolitan Toronto area since 1957. For many women, owning a fur coat provides them with a feeling of warmth, and comfort and the fur requires special care in order to maintain its natural characteristics.

"We have always been known as a 'full service' furrier where customers can expect professional, knowledgeable, and personal advice on restyling, alterations, cleaning and repairs," says Dan Kahnert, the 4th generation of the family business.

During the hot summer months, he stresses that cold fur storage is essential to prevent the premature drying of the pelts and to preserve the natural oils in the skin. Cedar closets and air-conditioned homes simply lack the necessary cold temperatures, the proper humidity levels, and an adequate circulation of air.

At storage time, every fur is examined by one of the family, and should any repairs need attending to, free estimates are provided. It is important to look after any small repairs early on so that further damage is avoided.

Over the course of a dirty winter, furs can accumulate dust, grime, and dirt and therefore require a professional fur cleaning. Kahnert recommends that furs should be cleaned once a year or at least every 2 years. This special cleaning process is an effective, preventative measure that will add years of beauty and life to your furs while restoring their natural lustre and silkiness.

You may also take advantage of their trade-in policy. Kahnerts will allow you up to an additional 15% off the Spring Sales prices on any new purchase when you trade in your outdated fur.

They offer a quality selection of Canada Majestic Mink, Sheared Beaver, Canadian Lynx, Sable, as well as Raccoon, Beaver, and Muskrat, in a wide range of styles, lengths, and prices.

Their selection of top quality shearling lambs and fur lined Microfibres round out their very unique and diverse product mix.

Kahnert Furs is located at 1702 Avenue Road (north of Lawrence) and can be reached at (416) 781-8472.

NA'AMAT TORONTO

Na'amat is making a difference in the lives of tens of thousands of Israeli children and teens, and yet, for every one we help there are two we can't. With your help, we can secure the future for a disadvantaged child in Israel. Israel's children of today are her citizens of tomorrow. Please help us help them.

80,000 Israeli pre-school children suffer physical or psychological abuse each year.

Case History: Leora is three years old. Her father was killed in the service. Her mother, unable to cope with the loss, had been neglecting and abusing her child.

$600 a year will provide a child with a loving home and psychological rehabilitation in a Na'amat full care residence.

In Israel, it is not illegal for parents to leave pre-school children alone and unsupervised. Many have no choice.

Case History: Uval is three years old. Left alone one day, he was nearly killed by a fall from a window. His parents had been desperately seeking subsidized daycare.

$400 a year will give a child loving care, nourishing meals and a pre school head-start in a Na'amat daycare centre.

Tens of thousands of Israeli teens need a refuge from problems at home...or within themselves.

Case History: Urit is fourteen. Her parents have never approved of anything she's ever done...so she ran away from home. She had been living on the street.

$500 a year will give a teen the opportunity to live in one of Na'amat's residential high schools where the youth will gain security and self-esteem along with university qualifications.

☑ Yes! I wish to spiritually adopt a youngster who is 'Growing up with Na'amat'. All donations are tax deductible. Please make cheques payable to: Na'amat Canada. Mail your cheque to:

Youngsters create and perform their own music

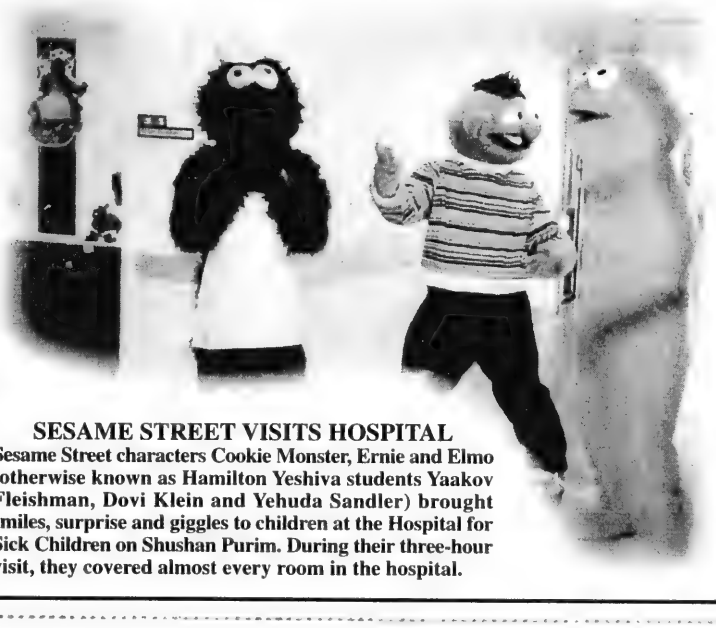
Twelve artists under the age of 15 from the Yahama Music School in North York will be performing their own original compositions in a National Junior Original Concert, hosted by Yamaha Canada Music Ltd. and Music For Life Yamaha Music School.

The concert will be held at the Convention Centre in London, Ont., on May 25 at 2 p.m.

Each year, students submit compositions created without limitations on musical style, instrumentation or presentation. From these submissions, some musicians are chosen to participate in various concerts. More than 45,000 compositions are submitted each year.

Tickets cost $8 for adults and $4 for children and are available through Cathy Landolt at Yamaha Canada Music Ltd. in Toronto 416-298-1311 or through Music For Life Yamaha Music School in London 519-686-0200.

Laura Silberberg, 10, will be one of 12 young composers featured in a Yamaha National Junior Original Concert in London, Ont., on May 25. This concert will be her third concert appearance.



SESAME STREET VISITS HOSPITAL

Sesame Street characters Cookie Monster, Ernie and Elmo (otherwise known as Hamilton Yeshiva students Yaakov Fleishman, Dovi Klein and Yehuda Sandler) brought smiles, surprise and giggles to children at the Hospital for Sick Children on Shushan Purim. Book Review & portrait too

A friend's heroism

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

There are many, many books about the terrible things that happened to Jews during the Holocaust. But there are very few that tell the wonderful story of the tiny country of Denmark, whose brave citizens saved nearly all of the Jews in the country.

Lois Lowry's Number the Stars (Houghton Mifflin, 1989) tells that story.

Annemarie and Ellen are two 10-year-old girls who are best friends. They both like sports, pretending they are characters out of books and looking at fashion magazines. The only difference is that Ellen is Jewish.

For the first few years of the German occupation of Denmark, everything goes on for the girls more or less as before, except for food shortages, and a lot of "making do" with less of everything else as well.

Then, the news is leaked that the Nazis plan to round up the Jews and send them away. Annemarie's family helps Ellen and her parents get away to the seashore and eventually escape to neutral Sweden.

In the process, Annemarie discovers how brave she is, how people she considered very ordinary were working for the Resistance and how very proud she could be of her countrymen.

Part of the inspiration for their actions came from the Danish king, who made it clear that the Jewish citizens of Denmark were no different from the Christian ones.

While Number the Stars is a work of fiction, the story of the Danes' compassion and courage is true. And just as Annemarie's family does for Ellen's, the Danish people looked after their Jewish neighbors' homes and welcomed them back after the war to sparkling clean homes, with fresh flowers on the table.

Dream Fund honors 2 children, hospital

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A silent auction and dinner will pay tribute to two young children, and at the same time, benefit the Hospital for Sick Children.

The Carrie and Adam Dream Fund first annual dinner and auction will take place on May 8 at the Moonlight Ballroom, 3125 Bayview Ave., North York. Cocktails and silent auction preview are at 6 p.m., and dinner is at 7 p.m., followed by a live auction.

Adam Prusznowski died at the end of 1993 of non-Hodgkins lymphoma at the age of eight. Carrie Risa Dimitry, just past her bat mitzvah, succumbed to familial dysautonomia, a rare genetic disease, in July 1995.

The Carrie and Adam Dream Fund was established by their parents, Hilary and Bernie Prusznowski and Brenda and David Dimitry.

A media release explains that "both children expressed a strong desire to help other children. It was their greatest wish to provide a means of being able to give something of themselves to help other children suffering from disease."

Proceeds of the evening will go to two programs at the Hospital for Sick Children. The Therapeutic Clown Program trains clowns "to help children deal with the alienation, fear, loneliness, anxiety and terror of staying in the hospital, allowing the child to be him/herself and to minimize the stress in an alien environment."

The fund will also assist in new areas of pediatric oncology research. "It is hoped that this research will result in more effective and far less painful treatment, and [will] facilitate an eventual cure."

Cost of the dinner is $100. A $50 tax receipt will be issued. Kosher food is available on request.

For more information, call Hilary Prusznowski, 416-636-0067, or Brenda Dimitry, 905-764-0999.

Bloor JCC adopts new exercise regimen

By PAUL LUNGEN

Lisa Sarner demonstrates one of the exercises that can be done on the reformer. [Paul Lungen photo]

TORONTO — In Hollywood, movie stars fed up with sports injuries have made "pilates" the hot new exercise craze. With that kind of cachet behind it, can mass popularity in Toronto be far behind?

The people at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC) believe Toronto is ripe for interest in the new exercise regimen, pronounced puh-lat-eez. Named for its founder Joseph Pilates, the technique is designed to lengthen and strengthen muscles without the harmful injuries associated with more traditional exercise programs, like high-impact aerobics or step classes.

Pilates is performed mostly on mats, with extra work done on a medieval-looking contraption called a "reformer." The resulting full-body workout leaves you exhilarated, says Lisa Sarner, a staff instructor at the Bloor JCC and a pilates devotee.

The key to pilates is "pelvic stabilization and abdominal control," she explains. "It strengthens the muscles deep in the body" while stressing proper breathing and movement control.

In Toronto, the Bloor JCC is one of only a few sports clubs and special studios offering the innovative program. Participants sign up for a four-week group program or engage Sarner for private lessons.

Pilates is perfect for all age groups, she says, from young athletes and dancers to seniors in search of a gentle, yet thorough workout. Some of her clients are in their 60s and they love being able to get a complete workout in their own homes, she adds. At the Bloor JCC participants work out in the dance studio three times a week in groups of 10 to 15.

Back in the early part of the century when he was developing the technique that would bear his name, Pilates' approach was to use muscles in a controlled manner in harmony with breathing. The key concept he developed was to stabilize the trunk, particularly the abdominal area and as a result, many of the exercises focus on that area, though they are not limited to it.

Pilates adherents stress that it can be applied as a system of whole-body conditioning. For those active in other sports and who may exercise one particular part of their bodies (cyclists' legs, for example), pilates can strengthen and condition other parts of the body as part of the overall goal of creating strength, agility and balance.

It is also used in rehabilitation for those suffering sprains, strains, fractures and spinal problems.

At the Bloor JCC, Sarner supervises work on the reformer, a rectangular device with a sliding carriage. Participants sit on the carriage, which is attached to a number of springs, and using pulley cords, push and pull themselves in a variety of positions on the carriage. The continuous motion, when done properly, stretches and strengthens muscles gently and without any jarring. A single machine offers dozens and dozens of exercises and variations.

Sarner became a fan of pilates after she took a mat class. A longtime dancer and yoga practitioner, she said that "right away I could tell it was great. It was very challenging and it required a lot of concentration and focusing.

"There is a lot to think about and pay attention to when you do pilates," she continued. "You have to learn how to work your own body, as opposed to the instructor telling you what to do."

Sarner said she became more aware of body movements in everyday situations, like doing housework, because of pilates. "I was much more aware if I was tensing up my muscles," she said. "If you pay attention to how you use the body in pilates, you get much less strain."

Unlike yoga, pilates has no unusual contortions, though both disciplines stress lengthening and strengthening of muscles.

For beginners taking pilates, an aerobic workout may be off in the future. First, you have to become somewhat accomplished at the exercises and using the reformer. Then you can switch exercises quickly and work the aerobic system, she said.

So far, the centre has been receiving a few calls every day about it, said Bloor JCC fitness and recreation director Lindsay Henderson. "We're trying to offer programs that are up and coming and that are attractive to our members and prospective members," he said.

In addition to pilates, Friday yoga classes are proving extremely popular at the centre, with Sarner leading groups of up to 32 in "power yoga," an intense and challenging variation of the traditional eastern pursuit.

Bogey Tour offer participants a real choice

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Insurance broker Lennie Exton has become a partner in The Bogey Tour, a new concept in golfing.

"Although I enjoy golfing immensely, I do not belong to a golf club," said Exton, who added that over the years, he has played at public and semi-private golf clubs and at charity golfing events.

A notice in a Richmond Hill newspaper in November 1995 caught Exton's attention. Golf enthusiasts Carl Good and Devon Bestard were launching golf tours in which participants would play at 10 different courses throughout the season.

The golf package includes all fees and taxes, prearranged tee-off times, electronic handicapping and membership in the Ontario Golf Association.

Exton joined the 1996 inaugural season along with 150 other duffers and scratch golfers. Compatible golfers were matched up and divided into flights to insure that golfers of like ability would be competing against each other. The first season was such an overwhelming success that plans were set in place to expand beyond the Toronto area.

The golfers, who play every second week throughout the season, have a choice of seven tours, some during the week, others on the weekend, and an executive tour for golfers who prefer to play more exclusive courses.

There are now three tour regions — the west covers Oakville, Burlington, Hamilton and Kitchener; the east includes Pickering, Ajax, Whitby and Oshawa; and the north focuses on Toronto, Richmond Hill and Aurora.

The Bogey Tour will accept 1,050 golfers for the 1997 season and it is filling up very quickly, Exton said. Membership is open to men and women, as individuals or in groups.

The tour has $35,000 in prizes including longest drive and closest to the hole. Among the events throughout the season are two dinners, a year-end banquet and the presentation of prizes.

Each year, part of the proceeds will be donated to charity, Exton said. "This year, we will support Breast Cancer International, and the Yellow Brick House in Aurora — a shelter for abused women.

"I believe that this concept is great," says Exton. "You don't have to pay up-front membership fees, which are considerable and we arrange everything — you just have to show up and play."

The cost for the season varies from $499 to $879, depending on the tour. "And we are arranging for corporate sponsors which will keep the cost to golfers reasonable. We plan to form women's, juniors' and seniors' tours next season."

For the future, they hope to organize tours throughout Canada and the United States.

"The popularity of golf is growing," said Exton who notes that according to Statistics Canada, participation in golf is growing by 7.6 percent a year. "By 2001, golf will rank as Canada's most popular sport, thanks to aging baby boomers searching for low impact forms of exercise."

This Maccabi Canada team keeps its head above water

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — If there's one thing that can safely be said about the water polo team Maccabi Canada (MC) is sending to the Maccabiah Games in Israel in July, it's that they'll be able to easily keep their heads above water.

Picked recently at national trials in Montreal, the select 11, according to Mordy Gordon, MC's national water polo chair, represent a stronger and deeper bunch of swimmers than the team of '93, when the Canadians missed out on a bronze against Brazil from a starting field of nine countries.

It will be only the second time since 1969 that Canada has fielded a water polo team. About 10 Maccabi countries will compete in water polo this year.

Gordon said frankly that while it's unlikely that Canada will do better than a bronze in Israel – behind the very powerful Israeli and U.S. teams, which finished first and second in '93 – a bronze is definitely in the offing.

"It's a good, solid, base team," said Gordon, who became involved in water polo soon after his three sons did.

"We have very strong goaltending with the return of Ryan Gordon, who will be backed up by Karil Boudko."

Coaching the team and on his first trip to Israel will be Patrick Oaten, head of the water polo department at the Dollard des Ormeaux Civic Centre and, at only age 23, a past member of Canada's national water polo team.

"He knows the game and the players," Gordon said. "He brings lots of enthusiasm to the game."

Gordon's optimism about the prospects for a medal are based on several factors:

Elite squads

Two of the players — Montrealer Mike Gordon, 23 (and Mordy's son) and Torontonian goalie Karil Boudko, 17 — play for Canadian elite squads.

Last year, Mike was instrumental in helping Canada earn its first medal ever — a bronze — while a member of Canada's junior national water polo team competing at an international juniors competition in Cuba in advance of the junior Worlds.

Boudko has played starting goalie on Canada's elite juvenile "dream team."

Four of the players are veterans of Maccabiah '93.

They include goalie Ryan Gordon (also Mordy's son) of Montreal; Montrealers Val Muscalu and Mitch Schipper, 23 and 26 respectively, and Torontonian Mike Greenwood, 23.

The water polo team is rounded out by Maccabiah first-timers: Calgarian Mike Dykman, 33, playing the "hole" position at centre; Torontonians Aaron Malken and Mark Resnick, both 21 (Malken currently goes to school in Vancouver and at 6'4", is the team's tallest member); and by Montrealers Ted Schipper, 28 (and Mitch's brother) and Guy Dollinger, 25.

The team will be co-captained by Greenwood and Mitch Schipper, while Mike Gordon will "quarterback" the team, his father said.

All in all, thinks Mordy, a very capable squad in a sport that tests endurance to the max. Players (six players plus the goalie are in the water at any given time) need quick reflexes, great hand-eye coordination, and the strength to move continuously while passing and controlling the ball.

Also needed is more than a little aggressiveness, Gordon said. Whatever the action is above the water line, it is even more physical literally beneath the surface, where opposing players kick at each other continuously and violently to fend each other off.

The Inside Back

Honoring survivors deepens understanding of risks taken

By IRVING GREENBERG

How shall we focus the commemoration of Yom Hashoah? In the light of the Madelaine Albright affair and the Swiss banking revelations, it is time to focus on the heroism of the survivors and the courage they showed in deciding to continue to live as Jews.

Yom Hashoah

In Jakob Presser's classic novel of the destruction of Dutch Jewry, Breaking Point, a young man has been befriended and kept alive by Jeremiah Hirsch, his neighbor in the Westerbork camp.

Hirsch was a Hebrew studies teacher back home. The young man's name is called for the weekly transport to Auschwitz. He lashes out hatefully at Hirsch, who, bewildered, asks him, "Why explode at me?"

The lad responds, "When they call out your name, you will have had a lifetime of community, of joy and of learning, of meaningful reward for being Jewish. For me, there was nothing. You know why you suffer. For me, it came for no reason. I rage that my life will be destroyed meaninglessly."

Small wonder, then, that after the war, tens of thousands of assimilated Jews who had barely survived were furious at their meaningless suffering and determined to escape this fate once and for all, hid their identities and passed as gentiles.

Every survivor, even those who had lived rich Jewish lives before the war, had to answer questions to themselves. Shall I continue? Is it worth it? Shall I inflict this possible fate on my future children and grandchildren?

Those who lost families, those who had seen loved ones, their own flesh and blood and countless others killed, tormented, abandoned, had to decide where to go and what to be.

The survivors found a world that was unrepentant, a world in which most Nazis escaped punishment, in which Britain kept the doors of Palestine locked and set up camps in Cyprus where displaced persons who tried to make aliyah were interned.

They found banks which seized their families' accounts and stonewalled their requests for reimbursement.

They found Jewish communities that did not want to hear atrocity stories or expressed shame at the victims' "passivity" rather than at their own colossal wartime indifference.

Even survivors who were deeply committed and well received were uprooted and needed to move to new countries to start new lives. It was a chance to escape Jewish fate, a temptation to make a clean break with Jewish faith.

Try to understand the decision of Albright's parents. The Korbels escaped the worst by being abroad during the Holocaust, but their family did not.

Think of Madeleine Albright rushing through life as her cousin Magda and others called out to her.

Another heart-stopping Holocaust scene comes to mind. A Jewess passing as a gentile is walking hastily toward her destination when a "schmalzownik", a Gentile who preyed on hidden Jews by threatening to expose them, calls out to her.

Her heart is beating wildly, but she keeps a straight face. She must not let on or all is lost. If she stops, she is trapped in her Jewish fate. If she turns around, all her incredible hiding effort is for nothing. She presses forward as if she does not hear.

On Yom Hashoah, judgment should not be passed on the Korbels. The incredible heroism of every survivor who decided to go on living as a Jew should be appreciated.

What a willingness to undergo kiddush HaShem (sanctifying God's name), what unquenchable faith in the possibility of tikkun olam (repairing the world) these survivors expressed.

Yom Hashoah is the day to unconditionally sing the praises of every Jew who did not – and of all Jews who do not – flee their identity. A second moment of silent homage, honoring the bravery of Jewish survivors, should be added to this day.

On Yom Hashoah, God should put on two pairs of t'fillin in which is written, "Who is like you people, Israel? A unique nation in the whole world!"

For one day, let's stop underestimating the daily courage of survivors and all Jews alike. If it happened once, it can happen again, however unlikely that fate seems in America.

On Yom Hashoah, let's take one more pledge: I will learn, I will live, I will celebrate with my family, my friends.

Never again should any Jewish child or adult be so deprived of their birthright of Jewish joy, distinction and meaning that they would question whether it was worth the risk.

COFFEE CHICKEN

THIS RECIPE BROUGHT TO YOU BY...

HERB CAPLAN WE SELL Whirlpool FOR LESS

1111 Weston Road (S. of Eglinton) 767-1655

1/3 cup ketchup
2 tblsp. red wine vinegar
1 cup brewed coffee
1 tblsp. olive oil
3 tblsp. pancake syrup
2 tblsp. orange juice concentrate
1 clove garlic, minced
2 tblsp. chopped onion pinch pepper
1 chicken cut in 1/8's

Mix all sauce ingredients and bring to a boil. Reduce heat and simmer about 5 to 10 minutes until thickened.

Preheat oven to 350°F. Place chicken, skin side up in a dish just to fit, pour over sauce.

Bake for 1 hour, or until juices run clear. Baste once or twice. Freezes well. Good hot or cold.

About families

Dear Susan,

My mother, a widow, is due to make her pilgrimage home just this side of Passover. I have enjoyed four months of peace but now feel doomed to incarceration. When my mother returns, I'll have a bevy of responsibilities. How can I cope?

Dear Reader,

It sounds like you feel snowed under. You might feel less anxious if you made your load more manageable.

Generate a list of tasks that you do for your Mom for house management, cooking and finances. Delineate the tasks in each group and prioritize from easiest to most difficult. Asterisk tasks that can be delegated to another family member or a professional. Hold a family conference with siblings and spouses in order to create a tenable plan. Know that you are not alone in your job as caretaker but there are others who can assist you.

The elderly often need a team of supporters. Do not hesitate to form a team of caregivers and delegate one as the case manager. This frees you up to be just a daughter. Should you feel overburdened, remember that you have other loved ones counting on you and you can ill afford to burn out – like a well-run race, proper training and pacing are the issues. Should you have some emotional baggage, consider individual or group therapy privately or within a public agency such as Jewish Family Services.

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 18 years.

THE REPORT ON THE STATE OF WORLD JEWRY

Every day our world as Jews is changing. Headlines explode the latest news, each one challenging our thoughts and feelings from new directions.

The Report on the State of World Jewry will synthesize the events of our times, helping us to make sense of what is happening around us, and where it may lead us to.

- What is driving the Peace Process and what are the next steps?
- Is the dream of peace dashed, or is war inevitable?
- What is the Clinton administration's real agenda?
- Who is setting policy in the White House and why?
- Why do half of Israelis feel headed for civil war?
- Why do more editorials deal with Israel than any other country than the U.S., while less than 1% of the world population lives there?
- How far-reaching is the issue of Holocaust victims' money in Switzerland?
- Does the world see a drive for justice or cause for anti-semitism?
- How much money is really involved, and who can find it?
- What are the latest trends of intermarriage and assimilation?
- Who is a Jew and who is behind this issue?

Aish HaTorah has once again assembled a remarkable panel of experts who are also leaders in their fields. They will provide Toronto an in-depth analysis of today's events from a unique perspective behind the closed doors of power, and beyond the reach of mass media.

And celebrate YOM YERUSHALAYIM with a special video address to the Toronto Jewish Community by JERUSALEM MAYOR EHUD OLMERT!

AS A JEW AND AS A CANADIAN, YOU CANNOT AFFORD TO MISS THIS REMARKABLE OPPORTUNITY.

Why Invest Your Charitable Dollars In Aish HaTorah?

Every astute investor knows the importance of balancing one's portfolio. Which investments will bring the greatest return? The same is true in philanthropy.

- What are the most important needs in my community?
- Which organizations are getting the biggest bang for the buck?

There are many worthwhile causes in our community. The question is how to balance one's portfolio.

• What are the most important needs in the Jewish community?

For years, leaders of North American Jewry and even Israel have been raising the battle cry that we must counter the devastating effects of assimilation.

Yet how much is truly being done? Whatever the answer, we know it's not enough. We are losing literally millions of young Jewish people! What can be done? What are we going to do about it?

We must redouble our efforts and invest in those programs that are proving effective.

• Which organizations are getting the biggest bang for the buck?

Aish HaTorah has quickly become recognized as one of the world's leaders in Jewish outreach education. Its success lies in its emphasis on developing committed young leaders, and finding creative solutions in Jewish education and marketing.

Aish's track record speaks for itself:

- 75,000 people attend programs in 1996 around the world
- 8,000 attend in Toronto alone in 1996 at 4 affiliate branches, and an additional 10 educational locations for High Holidays for beginners
- 20 branches spring up in the former USSR in 5 years, reaching over 12,000, and another 10,000 Russians in Israel
- 60,000 attend the Discovery Seminar in over 100 cities, making it the highest attended program in Jewish history
- The Jerusalem Fellowships for campus leaders becomes Israel's fastest growing program for university students, chaired by Senators Moynihan and Specter
- New branches in 1996 in South Africa, Birmingham Alabama and Philadelphia
- New buildings going up in Miami, St. Louis, New York, Los Angeles and Toronto (The Village Shul) to keep up with the huge demand
- The Israeli government recognized Aish's central importance to World Jewry by donating the largest piece of land directly facing the Western Wall

At a time when Jewish continuity is so threatened, Aish HaTorah is getting the job done. Your investment will ensure that every effort is made to continue to expand and touch the lives of thousands.

AISH HATORAH INSPIRING JEWISH PEOPLE EVERYWHERE WITH PRIDE

TORONTO, Ont. (Aish HaTorah News Wire Service) – Aish HaTorah, the international outreach movement based at the Western Wall in Jerusalem, has reached almost 75,000 young Jewish people this year with its message of Jewish pride.

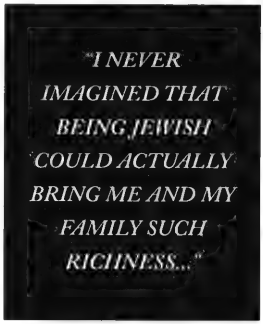
"I never imagined that being Jewish could actually bring me and my family such richness. Aish HaTorah helped us discover that it's great to be Jewish, and I'm glad I found out in time to give this treasure over to my kids." , Fran Jakubowicz said recently after attending a Discovery Seminar at the Dan Family Aish HaTorah Centre in Thornhill.

Such were the comments heard by enthusiastic men and women as they spent time delving into the meaning of Judaism at Aish HaTorah's myriad classes on every subject from Kabbalah to parenting, and from love to suffering.

Fran is not alone. Last year in Toronto, over 8,000 people joined her in attending Aish programs. Each one left a little prouder, which is Aish's goal.

"What keeps bringing me back for more", commented Larry Deverett, President of Sidea Corporation, "was the non-judgmental atmosphere where every question I posed was not just welcomed, but actually appreciated. I consider myself a professional skeptic, and I felt right at home."

And that's what they strive for, according to Rabbi Ahron Hoch, Educational Director of Aish in Toronto. "Our only expectation from our students is that they hit us with all their questions, and be as honest with us as we are with them. We tell them that one can never know who is a better Jew – that's G-d's domain, not ours. Our job is simply to communicate the beauty and pleasure of being Jewish — that sells itself."

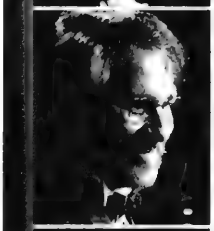


When asked what the secret of Aish's success is, Harold Nashman, Chairman of the Toronto Board responded "Young people are not willing to be Jewish for vague nationalistic or nostalgic reasons, and can we blame them? They need to see what Judaism can offer THEM, or in other words 'WHY BE JEWISH'? You can't be proud of something you don't know. When they discover the tremendous wisdom in our heritage they develop a deep sense of pride.."

Thanks to Aish HaTorah, and thanks to its many devoted supporters, thousands every year are finally getting a chance to be proud.

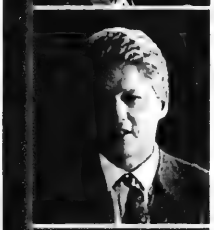
"Let me tell you about the most important Jewish project in the world."

Larry King



"Aish HaTorah, you do very good work. With the message you put out, I could have used you in my life 25 years ago."

Steven Spielberg



"Aish HaTorah has dedicated itself to the critical task of educating successive generations of Jews about the power of their history and the strength of their tradition."

Every child is an entire world

One who saves a life is like one who saves a whole world

C.R.I.B. - EFRAT is the non profit organization in Israel whose objectives are to:

- prevent unnecessary abortions.
- encourage and support jewish childbirth.
- strengthen the jewish family.

50,000 abortions are carried out in Israel every year, most of which are unnecessary and can be prevented.

Over the last decades, by providing social, psychological and financial support, C.R.I.B. - EFRAT has succeeded in saving tens of thousands of children whose mothers had decided to terminate their lives before they were born, because of socio-economic problems.

C.R.I.B. - EFRAT has developed a unique approach in its struggle against abortions performed for non-medical reasons.

C.R.I.B. - EFRAT is convinced that education, information, guidance and assistance in times of need can lead to a real drop in the number of unnecessary abortions, because most mothers who undergo an abortion do so at a time of temporary distress when they are not fully aware of the repercussions of their actions.

C.R.I.B. - EFRAT is Pro-Information and Guidance. We are against demonstrations and violence, and condemn breaking the law.

Let it be clearly said: We cannot prevent a woman from having an abortion if she really wants one and is determined to go ahead. But it is our duty to explain to her all the repercussions of her actions. Knowledge of all the facts will allow the woman to make the correct choice.

Children are a family's greatest source of happiness. Nothing compares to watching them grow and flourish. Every child contributes to the nation's existence and strength.

Help us continue the following essential activities:

- Educational programs on the importance of family life given in schools, military bases and to the general public.
- Financial assistance to needy, pregnant, jewish women considering abortion.
- Medical, emotional and legal advice plus guidance for pregnant woman.
- Assistance for unmarried pregnant woman, which includes accommodating them in supportive foster homes.

Children are our future

Israel rejects talks with Syria

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Israel has rejected a recent Syrian offer to renew peace talks, because it included as a precondition the government's agreeing to a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights, a senior official said last week.

Foreign Minister David Levy was to meet with European Union peace talks envoy Miguel Moratinos, to discuss ways of resuming the negotiations with Syria. Syria recently proposed three formulas to resume talks, which were relayed to the government by Moratinos, Foreign Ministry Director-General Eytan Bentsur said.

However, each proposal included a demand that Israel could not accept, and therefore the government rejected all three proposals, he said. Bentsur was speaking at a question-and-answer forum in Rehovot, where he was interviewed by former Davar editor Hannah Semer.

Bentsur, who was also to attend Levy's meeting with Moratinos, said one of the Syrian proposals was based on Resolution 242, but included a demand for a detailed breakdown of the resolution according to the Syrian interpretation, i.e. an Israeli commitment for complete withdrawal from the Golan. Israel, of course, rejected this demand, Bentsur said.

Religious leaders meet with Rock

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An unprecedented coalition of Canadian religious leaders has called on Justice Minister Allan Rock to step up the pursuit of alleged Nazi war criminals in Canada as a "moral imperative" and to express solidarity with the Jewish community.

Monday's hour-long meeting here between Rock and the faith leaders was described by Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's inter-religious affairs committee, as "cordial, open and friendly. We came away very encouraged by the moral strength of the commitment by the government to pursue the issue of Nazi war criminals on all fronts."

Representatives of the Roman Catholic, Anglican, United, Christian Reform and Evangelical Lutheran churches joined the World Sikh Organization of Canada and Congress to call on Rock to accelerate prosecutions.

Rock told a press conference following the meeting that "however it is we choose to worship our God, there is common to all religions a certain morality that requires justice, and in the case of war criminals from any era, requires that governments and nations act in an effort to achieve justice. And that is something we have attempted to do during the current government in relation to alleged Nazi war criminals."

Unity, war crimes on agenda

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

National unity and the pursuit of alleged Nazi war criminals living in Canada are emerging as the key issues for Canadian Jewry in the June 2 federal election.

Communal leaders agree the next government will have to deal with the results of a third and, some say decisive, referendum on Quebec's future, as well as bring closure to the file on suspected war criminals.

There's been a flurry of activity on the war crimes dossier: last week, leaders of B'nai Brith Canada (BBC) met with Solicitor General Herb Gray to discuss what the RCMP is doing; on May 5, a coalition of religious leaders and representatives of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) met with Justice Minister Allan Rock; and cross-country rallies, dubbed Nazi War Criminals in Canada: One is Too Many, are planned all through May.

Election '97

It's all part of a concerted effort to get Ottawa to act before suspects die. In the past three years, three alleged Nazi war criminals died during their legal proceedings.

Canada's Jews will be also affected by redrawn electoral boundaries, made necessary by a growing population and demographic shifts. Some ridings with high Jewish populations will be rejigged, while a new one – Thornhill, north of Toronto – will be created.

Last week, CJC unveiled its Political Action Guide, which outlines its perspectives on issues.

BBC is putting final touches on its election task force, co-chaired by Toronto lawyers Richard Bogoroch and Jim Klein.

ISRAEL

Israeli in Space

JERUSALEM — A 40-year-old combat pilot has been chosen to become the first Israeli to travel on a NASA space shuttle mission.

The pilot, who, under army regulations, cannot be named, was identified as an F-16 pilot and trained electrical engineer.

Science Centre

JERUSALEM — A prominent Keren Hayesod-United Israel Appeal lay leader in Barcelona, Spain, has donated $1 million (US) for the establishment of a science centre in the Negev town of Yeruham. The centre will contain laboratories for biology, chemistry, physics and computers.

FEDERATION CJA of Montreal has been involved with Yeruham for many years and has had a major impact on its quality of life.

Hikers Murdered

JERUSALEM — Israel has called on the Palestinian Authority to help find those responsible for murdering two Israeli hikers in Wadi Kelt, a popular hiking spot near the West Bank town of Jericho.

The bodies of Hagit Zavitzky of Kfar Adumim and Liat Kastiel of Holon, both aged 23, were found April 25 by other hikers.

The women's bodies were covered with stab wounds.

Israeli security forces believe the women were killed by Arab terrorists. No group claimed responsibility for the attack.

WORLD

Neo-Nazis Sentenced

PARIS — A painful chapter for France's Jewish community has ended after a French court sentenced four neo-Nazis for the 1990 desecration of 35 graves at a Jewish cemetery in the southern town of Carpentras.

Israel Blasts UN

NEW YORK — Israel lashed out at the UN General Assembly after the body adopted a resolution calling for an immediate halt to the construction of Jewish housing in southeastern Jerusalem.

The non-binding measure was adopted April 25, at the close of a two-day emergency session convened at the request of Arab states to marshal international pressure to halt Israeli building at Har Choma.

The vote was 134 to 3, with 11 abstentions, including Canada.

Polish Seders

ROME — Hundreds of Jews attended communal seders in Warsaw and other Polish cities this year, and many others hosted the Passover meal in their own homes.

Opportunities Abound

NEW JERSEY – The World Union of Jewish Students Institute in Arad, Israel, offers young adults, 21-35 a year-long program which combines seven months of Hebrew language instruction and Jewish studies classes, hiking, educational seminars and community volunteer opportunities with five months of career experience.

Registration is under way for sessions beginning June 24 and Oct. 28. For more information call 1-888-WUJSINS or e-mail to [wujsusa@internetmci.com].

U.S.-ISRAEL RELATIONS REACH "HIGH POINT"

Relations between Israel and the United States have reached "the highest peak of understanding" in five years and have been an effective deterrent to both the Soviet Union and the Arab states from renewing the conflict in the Middle East, Yitzhak Rabin, Israel's ambassador to the U.S. said.

Rabin declared that the most significant developments in the past year had been overall improvement in Israeli-American relations, the realization on Washington's part that "a complicated conflict could not be solved by words alone."

CONGRESS, AJCS ACCUSED OF EDUCATION NEGLECT

Canadian Jewish Congress and the Allied Jewish Community Services (AJCS) were criticized at a seminar in Montreal for spending time "squabbling over structure, power and their respective roles, to the neglect of essential matters."

Stanley Cohen, chairman of the educational committee of the Jewish People's and Peretz Schools, accused both bodies of neglecting Jewish eduction. "Are AJCS and Congress honestly concerned with education?" he asked.

Reform movement opposes conversion bill

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Reform movement must abandon its traditional low profile response to Israeli political developments and actively marshal opposition to Israel's proposed conversion bill, a meeting at Temple Sinai was told last week.

The bill, which has passed first reading in the Knesset, "has to do with the character and definition of the Jewish people, with issues of solidarity and unity worldwide," said Rabbi Lawrence Colton. "The issue is clear. This is the time to respond."

The bill, introduced by the Likud government's Orthodox coalition partners, would give the Orthodox Chief Rabbinate exclusive jurisdiction in Israel over conversions, barring recognition of Conservative and Reform conversions.

About 300 members of the congregation and others heard Rabbi Colton and Rabbi Michael Dolgin spell out a multi-pronged strategy to get Reform concerns addressed, including public education, letters of protest to Israeli politicians and support for Arza, the Reform Zionist movement.

But the depth of emotion created by the bill became apparent when former Temple president Austin Beutel took the floor and urged Reform Jews to use their pocketbooks to wield influence.

Money counts, said Beutel, president of the World Union for Progressive Judaism. He urged the congregation to build up Reform institutions in Israel as a means of enhancing their political influence, and he called on Reform contributors to the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) to pointedly ask UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to earmark their contributions for Reform causes.

Reform's "presence there will bring respect. The shouting and screaming does not," he said as many in the crowd applauded.

Rabbi Colton had made similar suggestions, though in a more circumspect manner. Contribute to Jewish causes that accept and recognize pluralism in the Jewish world. Try to carve out a larger share for its institutions in the communal funding process, he said.

Earlier, rabbis Colton and Dolgin said the bill has created a crisis and a defining moment for members of the Reform movement.

Israel is a major focus of Reform life. "We know that learning about Israel is crucial to building the identity of Jews," Rabbi Dolgin said, referring to the congregation's children.

Israel should be a place for all Jews, but the bill symbolizes a view that growth and diversity are less important than coalition politics. Though the bill is an Israeli political matter, it impacts on Jews the world over, he said.

In an often emotional address, Rabbi Colton said, "It's nobody's business to classify what kind of Jew you are. We don't have the right to say to any Jew that what he is, we deny... We are Jews because of the depth of commitment that wells from inside."

He called on the congregation to discuss the issue with leaders of local Jewish organizations and to convey to them "our pain and anguish."

Rabbi Dolgin said he was disappointed in the Conservative movement in Canada for not signing on to an international document protesting the bill. The American Reform and Conservative movements both signed the document and while the Canadian Reform movement adopted it, the Canadian Conservative movement did not.

"It's an embarrassment to the Reform rabbis of Toronto that we were not able to gain the consent of our Conservative colleagues and the Conservative movement," he said.

Contacted after the meeting, Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, president of the Conservative Rabbinical Assembly (RA), Ontario Region, said the RA did not have enough time "for appropriate and adequate consultation" of the document prior to its publication in The CJN, and so, could not sign on.

The RA did not disagree with the contents of the ad, he said, noting that the Conservative movements in Canada and Israel have long supported religious pluralism in Israel.

The RA is consulting with the Federation on the allocation of funds in Israel, he said, urging that donations go to "encourage religious pluralism and the development of Jewish identity."

NEW STAMP PAYS TRIBUTE TO SECRET IMMIGRATION

The Israel Postal Authority has released a five-shekel stamp commemorating the 50th anniversary of the historic voyage of the Exodus. The clandestine Haganah ship attempted to bring 4,530 Holocaust survivors to British-administered Palestine, but was attacked by the Royal Navy. Passengers were returned to France, and from there, to Germany. The issue also pays tribute to the overall efforts of Jews in Palestine to spirit immigrants past the British blockade from 1934 to 1948. For details, contact a stamp dealer or dial the Israel Philatelic Agency at 1-800-607-2799.

Thoughts on unity: Jewish and Canadian

Howard S. Joseph, the rabbi of the Spanish-Portuguese Congregation of Montreal, recently wrote an annotated translation of an essay by "The Neziv," Rabbi Naphtali Zvi Yehuda Berlin, called She'ar Yisrael, the Remnant of Israel. It has been published by Jason Aronson Inc.

The essay by The Neziv is itself about 80 pages. The notes accompanying the essay and the introduction by Rabbi Joseph are of equal length. Rabbi Joseph's introduction is rich in biographical material and historical, contextual commentary.

It is a slim volume overflowing with tightly-written, important, highly-relevant insights into modern Jewish life. It has special application in light of the recent controversy from New York caused by the Agudath Harabonim.

I shall excerpt a small part from Rabbi's Joseph's introduction.

"Who is She'ar Yisrael? While highlighting the supreme role of Torah scholars and their students, Neziv never departs from an all-inclusive definition of the remnant. All Jews are included. This, of course, is the classic view of tradition that prevailed throughout rabbinic Judaism. However, other Orthodox thinkers of the nineteenth century were moving into a more restricted view of the remnant as being limited to the most pious and observant segment of the community which was willing to segregate itself from other Jews in an attempt to resist modernity... Rabbi Berlin opposed separatist attempts in Eastern Europe and tried to maintain an inclusive, united, communal perspective.

"Nowhere does this vision emerge more clearly than in a responsum on the separatist issue. He calls the advice to separate a "harsh opinion, as swords piercing the body and threatening the existence of the nation." this would be a form of sinat hinam that has previously caused numerous tragedies in Jewish history. It would now do the same, turning Jew against Jew and weakening the survival of the nation. Remaining bound together we can survive."

Joseph develops this theme further, carefully establishing its great legal, moral and historical weight by demonstrating how it was adopted, expanded and further refined by his own teacher and mentor, the great Rabbi Joseph B. Soloveitchik, who happened also to be the Neziv's great-great-grandson.

Coursing through the pages of Rabbi Joseph's book is an obvious personal and rabbinic love of the Jewish people and a loyalty to the historic catch-phrase that we are all responsible one for the other.

Rabbi Joseph's translation of She'ar Yisrael is an important book.

Election airing

Throughout the federal election campaign, I will use this column to share thoughts with CJN readers on issues arising from the campaign.

In my opinion, the most compelling issue in this election is that of national unity.

I do not deny the importance of the competing economic planks in the respective parties' platforms. The level of national unemployment, hovering at or near 10 percent, is far too high. It suggests unacceptable numbers of people who are struggling to make a living, to provide for their families, to offer reasonably optimistic, dignified lives for their children.

Nor do I make slight of the differences in the social policies of the competing parties. High quality, state-funded, universally accessible health care is considered by most Canadians to be a chief hallmark of our society. So too do we regard a reasonably-affordable, compassionate "safety net" for those who are needy as well as affordable, high quality, state-funded, post secondary school for all Canadian children.

Indeed, there are a number of weighty issues on which to confront the candidates and their parties.

But beyond a doubt, the weightiest of all matters for Canadian voters to ponder, is that of the very viability of the country in its present political configuration.

The government that Canadians elect on June 2 will have to deal with the aftermath of the next referendum in Quebec, which, in all likelihood, will be held within 2½ years, before the turn of the millennium.

We must ask ourselves: Who, if anyone at all, will be best able to prevent a separatists' victory? Who will be best able to deal with separatists in Quebec City?

In either case, the deck is stacked against the federalist cause because the provincial government in Quebec City led by Lucien Bouchard is not dealing with federalists in good faith.

He has often said he would never "negotiate" a better deal within Confederation. His aim, plain and simple, is to remove Quebec outside Confederation, not to find it a more comfortable place within.

He therefore frequently points to "intransigent" premiers from other provinces whom he rightly points out are reluctant to constitutionally concede Quebec's distinctiveness. But really, the rest of his hand points back at him as well. For he has no interest or desire in sitting down at the table with the premiers to find reasonable compromise or accommodation.

To diminish Bouchard's arsenal of anti-Canada allies, one of the key objectives of all people who love Canada should be to elect as many federalists inside Quebec as possible. This would provide pro-Canadians a better opportunity to represent Quebecers inside the House of Commons and to satisfy their legitimate constituent concerns and needs.

Despite the slow start by Gilles Duceppe out of the "starting bloc" in the first week of the campaign, his party is still favored to win a majority of Quebec ridings. To prevent this result, federalists should avoid splitting the federalist vote in Quebec. Thus they should run only one candidate, the strongest, against the Bloc.

For the sake of the country, federalists must set aside their partisan differences. They should decide upon one federalist candidate who has the best chance of defeating the Bloc candidate. The rallying cry should be federalism versus separatism, not Tory versus Grit.

Most people see the Bloc clearly for what it truly is: an arm of the Parti Québécois in Ottawa. The recent organizational changes by Duceppe to his campaign team, where he brought a key Bouchard lieutenant to run matters, should dispel any contrary notions of independence of thought or of action.

Why should federalists add strength to Bouchard's hand? It makes no sense. The fewer Bloc MPs that are elected, the more the call for a united Canada will be heard in the House of Commons.

It would be a heartening act of patriotism, an example to us all of thoughtful, self-sacrificing, leader-like judgment.

It is not too late.

War crimes 'snitch line' misinterpreted, says Ronen

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One aspect of the controversial "snitch line" on suspected Nazi war criminals has been misinterpreted to mean that the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) would make deals with informants.

"It would be the Canadian government, not CJC, making such deals if the RCMP so recommends," Moshe Ronen, Ontario region chair, told the region's executive last week.

"The 'snitch line' has been active," Ronen said, expressing satisfaction with its operation but at the same time conceding "it was a difficult policy."

Referring to CJC's decision to support an informant line on war criminals, he said, "some progress has been made.

But "whether it will work out is still a question."

Ronen said revelations by Irving Abella, CJC's war crimes committee chair, "have put the government once again on the spot and put the issue front and centre before the Canadian public in the background of a national election."

The failure of the federal government to aggressively pursue suspected war criminal cases will be the major issue for Jews in the coming election, Ronen said. He suggested that in their door to door campaigns, all candidates be asked how they stand on the issue and to be reminded how important it is to the Jewish community.

CJC is sponsoring coast to coast public advocacy meetings on the issue. The Ontario meeting will be held May 22, 7:30 p.m. at the North York Council chamber.

Congress representatives will ask candidates in the coming election to urge Canada to support the peace process in Israel and to recognize Israel's security concerns, Daniel Fine, the region's political liaison officer, said.

The national unity issue is also high on the Congress list, he said.

A major effort will be made in the November election for the first Toronto mega-city council to press issues of concern to the Jewish community, Cary Green, the region's political liaison chair, later told The CJN.

On another matter, the executive was told by director Manuel Prutschi that Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick is "very supportive" of the need to keep Branson Hospital open.

At Harnick's suggestion, Congress is arranging a meeting with Cam Jackson, the minister responsible for seniors' issues, to discuss the implications of Branson's closure, he said.

On funding for Jewish day schools, the executive learned that provincial reforms to the education system will make it easier for such schools to receive equitable public funding.

"These reforms could ultimately make it easier for religious schools now outside the public-funded umbrella to receive funding," said Henry Koschitzy, committee chair.

It was announced that Stephen Shulman, a member of the Congress staff for the past four years, is leaving his job to practice law privately. Tributes to the work he has done as associate national director of community relations were made by his associates and by Congress lay leaders.

Deal on war criminal deportations disputed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Canada's former chief war crimes prosecutor has dismissed suggestions that there ever was a deal or an arrangement not to deport war crimes suspects from Canada.

"This is mere historic revisionism by some ethnic community leaders," said Bill Hobson, former head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit. "There never were any deals. I know. I was there."

Hobson was responding to suggestions that federal authorities agreed to stick to a "made-in-Canada" approach to Nazi war crimes suspects that would limit legal remedies to criminal prosecutions. In return for not deporting suspects, immigrant communities would not voice opposition to the criminal cases.

Gerry Meinzer, past president of the German Canadian Congress (GCC), said the Ukrainian Canadian community spearheaded the effort to limit action to criminal proceedings. The arrangement was no secret. "Everybody knew that was the tradeoff," he said.

Even Canadian Jewish Congress was aware of it, he claimed. About 12 years ago, when Justice Jules Deschenes headed a commission looking into the issue, former Congress national executive vice-president Alan Rose attended a GCC meeting and heard the discussion of it, Meinzer said. Rose died in 1995.

Irving Abella, chair of Congress' war crimes committee, said Congress backed criminal prosecutions but never agreed that that could be the only route taken against alleged war criminals. Federal authorities amended Canadian immigration legislation in the wake of the Deschenes commission to facilitate deportations and then actually deported Jacob Luitjens to Holland, he pointed out.

Government prosecutors dropped the criminal route when a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Imre Finta case made convictions virtually unattainable. At that time, the war crimes unit shifted to the denaturalization/deportation remedy, which had been employed successfully by the United States since 1979.

Arguments are being raised against deportations because "they don't want people from their own ethnic communities deported to Europe," Abella argued. Members of these communities know "that if there are no deportations, these war criminals would never be prosecuted."

Two former Justice Ministers, Ray Hnatyshyn and Kim Campbell, publicly stated that Canadian policy was to go the deportation route if the evidence couldn't support a criminal trial, Hobson said. Canada followed that policy in the case of Nazi collaborator Jacob Luitjens, who was deported to Holland, he said.

Meinzer said that case was different as Luitjens had already been convicted in absentia by Holland.

Meinzer agreed the case of Helmut Oberlander, a wealthy Kitchener developer who is facing deportation, has become prominent in the Canadian German community. But "it's an issue of principal. It's not just Oberlander," he said.

Hobson interpreted recent developments differently. "I think that in either the first case that goes before the courts or in the cases at the Supreme Court of Canada , they will seek to introduce evidence of the so-called arrangement to try to convince the court there has been a broken promise. If they can convince the court, that could result in a stay of proceedings," he said.

(The High Court has agreed to hear arguments for a stay in the Oberlander, Erichs Tobiass and Johann Dueck cases.)

In other developments, the Nazi war crimes commission of B'nai Brith Canada and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre met recently with Solicitor-General Herb Gray to press for further government action on the issue. The delegation called for increased resources for the war crimes unit and to cross-reference the names of war crime suspects with government pension and other lists.

Rally at Earl Bales draws over 1,500

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is time for Canada to "stop coddling" suspected Nazi war criminals and "prosecute them now, before it's too late," Irving Abella, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' war crimes committee, told the community's annual Yom Hashoah V'Hagvurah service on Sunday.

Yom Hashoah

"It is an outrage to all Canadians and an affront to survivors of the Holocaust that we have mass murderers living in our midst," keynote speaker Abella told over 1,500 people in Earl Bales Park, in the shadow of the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial.

Abella decried Ottawa's "dismal" record on pursuing alleged war criminals before federal cabinet minister Art Eggleton, Liberal MP Jim Peterson and Ontario Attorney General Charles Harnick.

For years, the damage Holocaust deniers do was not given enough attention. "We seriously underestimated their potential for evil," Abella said.

Holocaust survivors, he said, owe a special debt to history. They "must refuse to forget, and keep their memories alive loudly and publicly. They must not retreat to the silent numbness" of the immediate post-war years. Otherwise, "the next generation will be free to mythologize, without the check of reality."

This year's commemorative service took on special meaning with the awarding of Righteous Among the Nations status to three Ontario Polish Catholic families for having helped rescue Jews during World War II.

Israeli Consul General Jehudi Kinar, himself a child survivor, awarded medals struck by Yad Vashem to Maria Eckhard (posthumously); Anna and Antonin Lesak; and Irena and Ignacy Leszkowicz for their heroism. Each family hid Jews from the Nazis in wartime Poland, and Constantine Eckhardt, who accepted on behalf of his mother, Maria, was reunited, for the first time since the war, with Kalina Kleinberg, the Jewish teen they helped save.

The Poles join the 10,000 other Righteous Gentiles around the world who have been honored by Yad Vashem.

At an emotional breakfast reception Sunday morning, the descendants of the families rescued from certain death paid tribute to the award recipients. Children and grandchildren of those who were saved travelled to Toronto from across Canada and the United States for the tear-filled event.

At the observance later, dramatic readings and poems in English, Yiddish and Hebrew were read by Kate Minsky, Allen Farkas and Francesca David. Cantor Louis Danto recited Ani Ma'amin, K'El Maleh Rachamim, Kaddish and the Partisan's Song.

The service was presented by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem; Israel's consulate general; the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto; the Toronto Board of Rabbis and the Toronto Vaad Harabanim.

Writing contest winners

TORONTO — Winners in the 1996-97 provincial writing contest on the Holocaust have been announced.

Winniers in the junior division are: first, Doris Andrade; second, second, Amy Siegel; and third, Courtney McCabe.

Winners in the senior division are: first, Rayzie Shulman; second, Cameron Archer; and third, Martin Levy.

Over 100 entries from across Ontario were submitted and judged by a panel including Michelle Landsberg of the Toronto Star; Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University; and Ellen Cole of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

The contest award was sponsored by Wanda D. Lerek, author of Hold on to Life, Dear, and the Holocaust Remembrance Committee (HRC) of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"The annual provincial writing contest has been an enormous source of pride and satisfaction to our committee. The time, effort, care and sensitivity demonstrated in the submissions indicated that all of the participants worked very hard and thoughtfully in preparing for the contest," said Michael Herman, chair of the HRC.

Zikaron v'atzmaut

Sirens will sound throughout Israel on the 4th of Iyar. In the cities, on the farms, on the roads and in the playgrounds, people will stop in their places, bringing to a momentary halt the full dizzying pace of life in this Mediterranean miracle.

Almost 20,000 men and women have fallen in Israel's defence since 1948. The sirens are a call to their memory. In reverence and in love, people obey. Up and down the length of the tiny country, they will visit the cemeteries and the many monuments that mark the countless emotional contours of the ancient and beautiful landscape. Mourners' tears will fall to the earth to mingle with the sun-baked soil or perhaps, to dampen for a moment the dust on a memorial stone.

But at the end of the day, when the stars are visible in heaven, and when mourning has given way to sunrise, the sound of the sirens yields to the sound of singing. Up and down the length of the tiny country, on the 5th of Iyar, the people of Israel will celebrate their independence.

In cities and on farms, in the hills, in the valleys, in the playgrounds, on all the beaches and in houses of prayer, people will rejoice. Festival songs will fill the air, hovering like an approaching fine mist that then settles with the twilight upon the dust and the earth to help one day bring forth flowers in the field.

Their call to memory summons us too; their celebration must inspire our song. For we sing of the return, 49 years ago, of Jewish sovereignty to the land of our Jewish ancestors.

Human spirit undaunted

Over the past few weeks, all along the Red River Valley, nature showed its merciless face. The river flowed relentlessly northward into Manitoba, swelling over its banks, pouring onto adjacent fields, swallowing houses, farms and entire communities. And as the flood moved forward through Ste. Agathe in south Manitoba, it rained, it snowed and bitterly cold winds gusted more than 50 kilometres an hour.

But, though in awe of the sheer magnitude of its adversary's force, the human spirit responded, undaunted. Manitoba residents fought the flood with all their strength. Neighbors helped. And, as in the Saguenay flooding of last summer, Canadians too from all across the country are sending relief supplies.

The worst of the flooding has passed, but not the misery or the heartbreak for the thousands of people whose homes and livelihoods have been swept through the mud of the raging river.

We are inspired by the determination and the will of the fighters of the Red River flood. Their tenacity in the face of such an overwhelming foe is an example to all Canadians — lending a helping hand, standing shoulder to shoulder alongside their neighbor, and finding strength in common cause.

Incident on train to Bavaria

We are looking for Moshe Arens or Arends, now approximately 74 years old, or any survivors of an incident in a train in Germany from the Ruhr Valley to Bavaria March 15 to 18, 1940. Some Jewish children under Nazi police or SS guards were travelling on this train. A young German boy 7 years old tried to contact them and confronted the guards, which ended in an ugly scene.

A Young reader questions statements

The article (CJN, April 3) about the guy teaching baseball to kids was interesting, but I don't think a person doing good things should mention the money he makes. People who really are successful don't need to do that and it's not what being a Jew is or should be about.

Also, he called being a teacher something to fall back on. Being a teacher is the most important job there is. The word rabbi means teacher. Being a teacher should never be called falling back.

Anyway, my friends and I read your paper all the time and we are happy when you print stories that appeal to young Jewish people.

Perspectives

A most noble liberation movement

One of the most powerful examples of modern oratory was the speech delivered in the United Nations General Assembly by Ambassador Chaim Herzog during the debate on the infamous resolution, Nov. 10, 1975, the anniversary of Kristallnacht, declaring Zionism to be a form of racism. As we know, the resolution was adopted by the General Assembly only to be repealed 16 years later in 1991.

We have excerpted portions from Herzog's speech. It is a fitting commemoration both for Yom Ha'atzmaut, which we celebrate on the fifth day of Iyar and for his shloshim.

I do not come to this rostrum to defend the moral and historical values of the Jewish people. They do not need to be defended. They speak for themselves. They have given to mankind much of what is great and eternal. They have done for the spirit of man more than can readily be appreciated by a forum such as this one.

I come here to denounce the two great evils which menace society in general and a society of nations in particular. These two evils are hatred and ignorance. These two evils are the motivating force behind the proponents of this resolution and their supporters. These two evils characterize those who would drag this world organization, the ideals of which were first conceived by the prophets of Israel, to the depths to which it has been dragged today.

The key to understanding Zionism is in its name. The eastern most of the two hills of ancient Jerusalem during the 10th century BCE was called Zion. In fact, the name Zion, referring to Jerusalem, appears 152 times in the Old Testament. The name is overwhelmingly a poetic and prophetic designation. The religious and emotional qualities of the name arise from the importance of Jerusalem as the Royal City and the City of the Temple. "Mount Zion" is the place where God dwells. Jerusalem, or Zion, is a place where the Lord is King, and where He has installed his king, David.

King David made Jerusalem the capital of Israel almost three thousand years ago, and Jerusalem has remained the capital ever since. During the centuries, the term "Zion" grew and expanded to mean the whole of Israel. The Israelites in exile could not forget Zion. The Hebrew Psalmist sat by the waters of Babylon and swore: "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." This oath has been repeated for thousands of years by Jews throughout the world. It is an oath which was made over 700 years before the advent of Christianity and over 1,200 years before the advent of Islam; and Zion came to mean the Jewish homeland, symbolic of Judaism, of Jewish national aspirations.

While praying to his God, every Jew, wherever he is in the world, faces towards Jerusalem. For over 2,000 years of exile, these prayers have expressed the yearning of the Jewish people to return to their ancient homeland, Israel. In fact, a continuous Jewish presence, in larger or smaller numbers, has been maintained in the country over the centuries.

Zionism is the name of the national movement of the Jewish people and is the modern expression of the ancient Jewish heritage. The Zionist ideal, as set out in the Bible, has been, and is, an integral part of the Jewish religion.

Zionism is to the Jewish people what the liberation movements of Africa and Asia have been to their own people.

Zionism is one of the most dynamic and vibrant national movements in human history. Historically it is based on a unique and unbroken connection, extending some 4,000 years, between the People of the Book and the Land of the Bible.

In modern times, in the late 19th century, spurred by the twin forces of anti-Semitic persecution and nationalism, the Jewish people organized the Zionist movement in order to transform their dream into reality. Zionism as a political movement was the revolt of an oppressed nation against the depredation and wicked discrimination and oppression of the countries in which anti-Semitism flourished. It is no coincidence that the co-sponsors and supporters of this resolution include countries who are guilty of the horrible crimes of anti-Semitism and discrimination to this very day...

The re-establishment of Jewish independence in Israel, after centuries of struggle to overcome foreign conquest and exile, is a vindication of the fundamental concepts of the equality of nations and of self-determination. To question the Jewish people's right to national existence and freedom is not only to deny to the Jewish people the right accorded to every other people on this globe, but it is also to deny the central precepts of the Unites Nations...

How sad it is to see here a group of nations, many of whom have but recently freed themselves of colonial rule, deriding one of the most noble liberation movements of this century, a movement which not only gave an example of encouragement and determination to the peoples struggling for independence, but also actively aided many of them either during the period of preparation for their independence or immediately thereafter.

Here you have a movement which is the embodiment of a unique pioneering spirit, of the dignity of labor, and of enduring human values, a movement which has presented to the world an example of social equality and open democracy...

We in Israel have endeavored to create a society which strives to implement the highest ideals of society — political, social and cultural — for all the inhabitants of Israel, irrespective of religious belief, race or sex...

Zionism is our attempt to build a society, imperfect though it may be, in which the visions of the prophets of Israel will be realized. I know that we have problems. I know that many disagree with our government's policies. Many in Israel too disagree from time to time with the government's policies ...and are free to do so because Zionism has created the first and only real democratic state in a part of the world that never really knew democracy and freedom of speech...

As I stand on this rostrum, the long and proud history of my people unravels itself before my inward eye. I see the oppressors of our people over the ages as they pass one another in evil procession into oblivion. I stand here before you as the representative of a strong and flourishing people which has survived them all and which will survive this shameful exhibition and the proponents of this resolution.

The great moments of Jewish history come to mind as I face you, once again outnumbered and the would-be victim of hate, ignorance and evil... I am mindful at this moment of the Jewish people throughout the world wherever they may be, be it in freedom or in slavery, whose prayers and thoughts are with me at this moment.

I stand here not as a supplicant...

The vote of each delegation will record in history its country's stand on anti-Semitic racism and anti-Judaism. You yourselves bear the responsibility for your stand before history, for as such will you be viewed in history. We, the Jewish people, will not forget.

For us, the Jewish people, this is but a passing episode in a rich and event-filled history. We put our trust in our Providence, in our faith and beliefs, in our time-hallowed tradition, in our striving for social advance and human values, and in our people wherever they may be. For us, the Jewish people, this resolution based on hatred, falsehood and arrogance, is devoid of any moral or legal value.

At this point, Ambassador Herzog tore up the draft text of the resolution before the Assembly.

Opinions

The Bar-On residue

The so-called "Bar-On affair" will continue to fester like a sore in the Israeli body politic. The decision of the attorney general and legal counsel to the cabinet to indict Aryeh Deri, leader of Shas, but to refrain from indicting the prime minister or any of the others involved in the case (although the investigation into the roles of Avigdor Lieberman, Netanyahu's right-hand man and Minister of Justice Tsachi Hanegbi will continue) has resolved the immediate legal questions, but has left open the ethical questions raised by the story. The affair, like many political incidents of this kind, has no easy "solution," because it cuts through several fissures in Israeli society that find expression in the reactions to this unsavory episode in Israel's political life.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

In the reactions to the Bar-On affair, five existing fault lines can be discerned. The first is the debate over the basic tenets of democracy, the rule of law and ethical government. The second is the debate between religious and secular visions of the Jewish state. The third is the historic schism between Israelis of Ashkenazi (European) and Sephardi (Middle Eastern) origin. The fourth is the debate over the role of a free press in a democracy. And overarching all is the longstanding split between left and right on the peace issue in Israeli politics.

In Israel, these fault lines coincide, rather than conflict. In other words, those on the political left tend to be of Ashkenazi origin, more liberal on freedom of the press, more secular in their lifestyle and committed to democracy in western terms. Those on the right tend to be more traditional in their lifestyle, more critical of the press' liberal tendencies and less concerned about the nuances of ethical government and democratic practice.

As in similar episodes in Israel's history, there is hardly any discussion of the merits of the issue. In this case, these should involve the nature of due process in government appointments and the unacceptable introduction of extraneous, political considerations in an appointment that should be made strictly on professional merit. The position of legal counsel to the cabinet, which does not exist in the Canadian political system, ensures that cabinet decisions are screened against a test of the law. The person who holds the position must be free to act independently of the government's political interests, which in and of themselves are legitimate. He or she is there to challenge where necessary, rather than to find a way to justify the government's policies where they may run afoul of the law.

All prime ministers in Israel's history have found it difficult to live with legal counsel that is independently minded. But all have tolerated the necessity to have this independent view by their side. In the Bar-On case, the appointment was influenced by Deri's personal and political interests. This much is clear, even if the information that emerged during the police investigation did not lead to indictments.

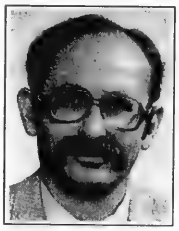
In Israel's politicized society, these issues have been colored by the fissures described earlier. Deri's accusation that he was, yet again, the victim of historic discrimination against Sephardi Israelis has acted as a rallying cry for those who identify with that grievance (although the decision to indict him alone has raised eyebrows in other quarters as well. It takes two to tango to make a deal, but he has been singled out). And that primary identification, on ethnic grounds, leads to all the rest.

Shas is a unique phenomenon in Israeli politics in the powerful package of ethnic, emotional and traditional religious messages that it evokes for its voters. In attaching itself to the political right as it has, Shas poses a difficult challenge to the left. The burden of proof is on the Labor party when it comes to its own social sensibility towards the disadvantaged in Israeli society.

In the longer term, the ethnic fissure can move in one of two ways. It can continue to act as a coalescing force for a coalition of aggrieved interests. On the other hand, the coalition of the former "outsiders" that has been in place since 1977 and that includes the political right, the Haredim and the Sephardim, could fall apart if Netanyahu fails on the peace front, or if the demands of the Haredim become too onerous for the political centre to tolerate. The Bar-On affair has simply highlighted the sensitivities attached to this simmering tension in Israel.

Seinfeld and Jewish identity

Jews have had a large impact on popular culture in North America for most of the 20th century. Burlesque, radio, movies and television have seen may individual Jews who have played valuable roles as producers, owners, directors, writers and actors. Yet as Irving Howe and other cultural critics have noted, explicit Jewish themes and images were rare, right through the 1960s.



By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

American popular culture was for the longest time ethnically and racially sanitized. The pervasive insecurities fostered by anti-Semitism and racism helped chase ethnic and cultural distinctiveness from any popular cultural products, even when produced by an "ethnic" artist, if it was aimed at a mass American audience.

Beginning in the 1960s and continuing steadily, America has rediscovered its diversity, and in the arts at least, has begun a tentative process of multicultural celebration. As minority groups became more self-confident, more often were ethnic characters to be found on television and movie screens. And contrary to the rhetoric of some minority advocates, research indicates that the depictions on these mainstream movies and television shows increasingly reflects a range of characters, rather than a uniform set of negative stereotypes. (The main exception might be Italian Americans, where the linkage with crime remains a staple of American movies, often create by Italian-American actors and directors).

Jews in particular have emerged from the cultural closet. Perhaps no show epitomizes this better than the TV sitcom Seinfeld. (The Nanny with Fran Drescher is comparable, but that show has not sustained the popular and critical acclaim of Seinfeld.) Not only is the lead character of Seinfeld Jewish, but there is a periodic use of Jewish themes, terms and subplots, ranging from mohels to Schindler's List to Jewish singles groups.

Jerry Seinfeld captures the ambiguous ambience of modern Jewish life with much of the same sensibility as Woody Allen when he is trying to be funny and not profound. Seinfeld is a New York Jew whose parents own a condo in Florida, but who is not observant in any meaningful sense.

A recent episode featured a dentist who converts to Judaism — we are not sure why — and starts to tell Jewish jokes and use Yiddish words. The show then draws a satirical parallel between the anti-Semite and the "anti-dentite," with dentists, like Jews, the victims of slurs, jokes and prejudice. The show ends on a bittersweet note: Seinfeld's prospective girlfriend jokes about getting rid of dentists, and then unexpectedly, of Jews and blacks as well...

I have no idea what impact shows such as Seinfeld have on non-Jews, who obviously are watching the show in droves. Research on the media suggests that such shows can reinforce stereotypes. I am just not clear what sorts of stereotypes — and whether positive or negative — a show like Seinfeld would reinforce in the mind of the average North American viewer, particularly someone beyond the New York area.

In addition, it is equally intriguing to speculate about possible impacts on the many Jews who also watch the show, particularly teenagers. On the one hand we could argue that like TV generally, the show presents a superficial and diluted view of Judaism. Seinfeld clearly does not keep kosher or observe Shabbat. But neither do most American Jews.

On the other hand, whatever minimal Judaic references are found in the show may well serve to reinforce Jewish identity by giving it the legitimacy of the Seinfeld aura. This is comparable to the security which immigrant Jewish families found in earlier generations when identifying with Jewish performers on the Ed Sullivan Show. Was there a Jewish home where watching Ed Sullivan — that friend of the Jews married to a Jewish woman — was not a defining ritual every Sunday night?

Both of these topics — the actual influences of Jewish content in popular culture on non-Jews and on Jews — could be the subject of serious doctoral dissertations. Such studies should try to go beyond analysis of the characters themselves, to trying to measure impacts in the areas of attitude changes or identity.

Already an Internet discussion group of Judaic scholars wrestled passionately with the question of whether George Costanza (another character on Seinfeld) was in fact Jewish. The consensus emerged that while he may be of Greek or Italian origin, he and his loud, stereotypical parents appeared to be quintessential New York Jews, and might well be thought so by viewers of the show.

People who worry about the Jewish future ought to recognize the importance of studying the link among Jews, Judaism and popular culture. For the sad truth may be that programs like Seinfeld, indeed the world of popular culture, both reflect and shape Jewish identity as strongly as do synagogues and Jewish schools.

Memories of Lidice

The village of Lidice is remembered as the scene of one of the more chilling of Nazi atrocities. Fifty-five years ago, in nearby Prague, the supreme ruler of Bohemia installed by Hitler was Reinhard Heydrich, who lacked all moral scruples and ruled with unprecedented cruelty. A small and dedicated underground movement decided to assassinate Hitler's hated representative. This threw the Führer into a frenzy of revenge and he ordered Heinrich Himmler to take appropriate action, which meant the Czechs should be once and for all dissuaded from making a similar attempt on a German overlord.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

The Nazis picked a small town to be publicly destroyed as a symbol of Nazi determination to suppress all opposition.

Jews, though not involved in the assassination, were of course also targeted for revenge. Three thousand were taken from Terezin and selected for immediate extinction. Another death selection was made by Goebbels in Berlin, who ordered 152 Jews to be executed as a form of "just reprisal."

Chroniclers have tried to recreate the terror and agony that befell little Lidice. First, the men. The order was given to assemble them in the town square, where the town house became a silent witness to Nazi capacity for cruelty. All men were shot in front of their families who, by command of the Nazis, were assembled in the square.

When the macabre ritual was over, trucks rode up; the women and children were separated, the former sent to the concentration camp at Ravensbruck, the latter to Gneisenau. At Ravensbruck, the women underwent medical experiments of the most gruesome sort; at Gneisenau, the children were either worked to death or — if they were blond and very young — were parceled out to German families in search of adoptable children.

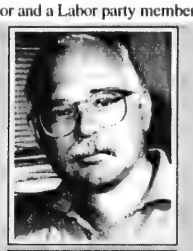
The end of Lidice itself came quickly. All homes were dynamited and blown up; what remained was levelled, the ground scorched, the corpses consumed in a wave of fire. Lidice was meant as a warning to the Czechs. Instead, it became a lasting symbol of Nazism in action. To make sure the lesson was learned, other places were exposed to a similar fate. Czechs would remember Lezaky, Bernatrice and Pardubica, along with Lidice; the world would remember only the latter.

All this came back to mind when recently an art exhibition entitled Homage to Lidice opened in Europe. Fifty-two German artists contributed to it, and the exhibit has attracted wide attention. In the end, only the imagination of artists can bring back the essence of something that words fail to describe. The Holocaust is of this order, and Lidice — though no Jews lived among the 450 inhabitants — partook of a demonstration that showed the potential of human cruelty.

Lidice was different from the Holocaust in one important respect: the destruction of the town and its men took place in public, for the Nazis wanted it to serve as a deterrent. No such effect was attached to the murder of Jews, and its nature and immense extent were withheld with great care from the world. And alas, when the news did leak out, the world paid little attention.

The Kirshner File

Chaim Herzog was guided by pragmatism



By Sheldon Kirshner

I met the late Chaim Herzog twice, in the late summer of 1982, when he was a touring author and a Labor party member of the Knesset, and in the summer of 1983, when he was president of Israel and in Canada on an official visit.

On both occasions, Herzog, his Irish brogue rising and falling, struck me as an urbane sophisticate who bore himself with regal bearing and who, in contemporary parlance, had seen that and done that.

Herzog served his country in a dizzying array of capacities, being a soldier, a spymaster, an ambassador, a parliamentarian and, finally, a president.

But above all else, as he revealed in his memoirs and epitaph, Living History (Random House, $42), which was published several months before his death on April 17 at the age of 78, he was a soldier.

"I have been many things," he writes,"but perhaps more than anything, I consider myself a soldier. If one has a great cause, I believe nothing is so noble as the willingness to fight and sacrifice for it."

These were not mere words. Herzog was the son of the chief rabbi of Ireland and the first Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel. He was born and raised in Belfast, but when he was a young man he and his family moved to Palestine, a British mandate.

When he was 16 years old, he joined the Haganah, the military arm of the Yishuv, and after he finished his law studies at London University he volunteered for service in the British army.

"I felt," he recalls in Living History, "it was my duty to be part of the forces fighting Hitler in his war against the Jewish people."

As a British intelligence officer, Herzog was among the first soldiers to cross into Germany in 1945. On Passover, he spent the night in a slit trench covered by a tarpaulin as Allied artillery pounded the Germans.

Just outside the city of Bremen, he came upon a small concentration camp, filled with emaciated figures clad in striped pajamas. But the real horrors of the Holocaust were not revealed to him until he drove into Bergen-Belsen, whose terrifying tableau left an indelible impression.

His Zionist convictions galvanized by these experiences, Herzog, still in uniform, breached regulations by doing everything in his powers to help illegal Jewish immigrants reach Palestine in operation Aliyah Bet.

Returning home to Palestine, Herzog briefly practised law before rejoining the Haganah as an observer, charged with monitoring the workings of the United Nations Special Commission on Palestine.

During the War of Independence, he was second in command of the brigade ordered to capture Latrun, which controlled the approach to Jerusalem. Herzog, sensing that it was ill-prepared for the mission, advised his commander to reconsider the planned offensive. But his advice was ignored, and the first battle for Latrun was a major defeat for Israel. However, as he points out, the struggle for Latrun pinned down Jordan's Arab Legion and was thus a prime factor in saving Jewish Jerusalem.

With the war still raging, Herzog was appointed deputy director of military intelligence. He lobbied hard for the job, as he recounts in his cogent memoirs. "The army was suffering casualties because of the absence of an effective intelligence organization. I knew I could change all that."

In January 1949, when the war had virtually petered out, he was promoted director of military intelligence, a post to which he would be appointed twice. Subsequently, Herzog was defence attache at Israel's embassy in Washington, commander of the Jerusalem Brigade, chief of staff of the Southern Command and, capping his career in the army, the first military governor of the West Bank.

As a person, Herzog could be exceedingly courteous, courtly and diplomatic, as learned when I interviewed him in Toronto. But Herzog, who was an assured and distinguished radio commentator during the Six Day War and the Yom Kippur War, was also a person who could cut to the core of an issue, however complex.

And in Living History, an apt title for a book whose author is nothing if not seasoned and worldly, there are no shortages of examples to illustrate this trait in Herzog's personality.

Israel, Herzog believes, missed opportunities in the wake of the Six Day War. Among them was the chance to create an autonomous Palestinian regime in the territories.

In his view, it would have enabled Israel and the Palestinians "to get along independently and cooperatively." I'm not at all sure that Herzog's perscription for peaceful coexistence would have enjoyed the confidence and support of the Palestinians, but it should have been tried.

Herzog was Israel's representative at the United Nations when the Zionism-equals-racism resolution was passed. "We were facing the severest attack on the Jewish people since Hitler, yet the silence of the U.S. Jewish community was deafeaning..." he notes indignantly.

In his opinion, the 1982 invasion of Lebanon was "a disaster for Israel," a judgment which found little favor with so-called Jewish community leaders as it unfolded.

Steeped in history, unafraid of future

"It proved that no matter how just the cause, it is wrong for a nation to damage that cause by grasping for more power. It also impaired Israel's deterrent posture, cost many lives, diminished our self-confidence, wasted years which could have been devoted to developing the new peace with Egypt, and, most serious of all, broke a heretofore national consensus on our ability to wage war and the moral basis for doing so."

Herzog's pragmatism is also evident in his views of post-war Germany and of Franco's Spain.

In the late 1950s, Herzog paid the first official visit of an Israeli army officer to the Bundeswehr, West Germany's army. With the Holocaust still fresh in his mind, he doubtless had reservations about stepping on German soil. But, finally, he went. "While Jews, especially, can't forget the past, we must live for the future," he observes. "We must move forward — and that includes forging relationships with Germans and Germany."

As he reflects on this trip, he writes: "Since 1965, when Israel and Germany established diplomatic relations, Germany (has) done more to strengthen Israel than any country other than the United States."

As for Spain, Herzog thinks that Israel erred in rebuffing a 1952 overture by Madrid to establish formal ties. "...we could not be guided either by events of 500 years before — the expulsion of the Jews — or by the nature of the current government. If we were prepared to establish relations with the Soviet Union under Stalin, and would have been prepared to do so with the Arabs, with their complete absence of human rights, then the fascist nature of the dictatorship of Spain did not warrant our failure to establish relations with a country sharing the Mediterranean and of great geopolitical importance to Israel."

Herzog's realism was applicable to the Middle East as well. In the concluding pages of Living History, he urges Benjamin Netanyahu "to move from slogans to a clear policy." He adds: "It will be interesting to see how he reconciles his earlier rhetoric with the need to move toward peace."

As usual, Herzog hit the nail on the head. He was a man steeped in history, but unafraid of the future. For that he will be remembered.

Politics in Israel threatens Jewish unity

By RABBI LAWRENCE M. COLTON

We must be brought back sharply to reality even in the afterglow of Pesach observance.

Two major issues threatened to eclipse Pesach this year — the Shas Conversion Bill issue and the latest Israeli political scandal involving some of the highest Israeli political leaders. Whether the current Israeli government survives the latter, the first issue clearly poses a threat to the Jewish people that is far greater than whether a government pulls through. Depending on this Israeli government's status, we could still be on the eve of the Shas Conversion Bill's being introduced into the Knesset. This bill would enter into the Israeli legal codes a law forbidding conversions not authorized by the Rabbanut.

Israeli government leaders must be made to understand just how serious this is. The problems that were predicted as a result of the religious monopoly granted to the Orthodox establishment in the State of Israel have finally come home to roost. De facto, this legislation alone is clearly an attack on the Diaspora. There were damaging consequences to the sense of amchah that has kept the Jewish world unified. There is no more time to procrastinate.

Those who continue to remain silent in the face of the threat of this legislation are joining forces with the most radical elements — those who in North America recently declared that Reform and Conservative Judaism are not Jewish.

At the heart of the bickering is not the question of whether non-Orthodox conversions will be allowed b'Eretz Yisrael, but whether world Jewry will remain unified, strong and unequivocally whole. What must still be confronted now, in a timely fashion, is the spectre of the Jewish world's becoming irretrievably divided.

Responsible rabbis, along with equally responsible Jewish leaders, must decide conclusively that the so-called righteous and holy acrimony must cease. Israeli government leaders cannot continue to claim that the Diaspora is interfering in national state matters. This is a religious crisis that transcends borders.

It is scandalous to continue to read in the public press that the Reform and the Conservative movements are not Jewish. It may well have been only a small splinter group of extremists who dared to say this. Yes, the support given since then, with mainstream Jewish leaders of all persuasions repudiating the statement, was noteworthy. But the fact remains that the core of the issue, the Shas Conversion Bill, gave birth to this public disgrace. The general world read the rhetoric and hear the vindictiveness through worldwide cable television news. The key spokespeople for extremism received worldwide coverage.

We Jews must first live peacefully with each other if we are ever to live peacefully with the world at large. No Jew can sanction an internal division that threatens to separate us. There still are serious consequences to the Knesset bill. We can never again continue doing business as usual. The times now are different. The Jewish world must be strengthened by remembering and reactivating the biblical dictum, "All Israel is responsible each for the other."

Therefore, I called upon the federations, Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith Canada and all Jewish organizations and their leaders to join in denouncing this action pending in the Knesset; to disclaim these radicals who besmirch the Jewish image; and to seek and implement methods to guarantee that Jews can find ways to coexist. When all the dust settles in this latest Israeli political scandal, the Shas mind-set to deny all but Orthodox conversions performed in Israel will still be an agenda item of discrimination and anger. They will still direct their disdain towards the Reform and Conservative movements in Israel and the Diaspora.

Kids need our help understanding world

By Dr. ELLIOTT MALAMET

All parents want to give their children as much as, if not more than, they had growing up. Beyond material comforts, even beyond love, what young children need from us is a way to understand the world and make sense of it, to negotiate the moral and ethical dilemmas of the sandbox and the schoolyard. Although they may express their concerns in a manner that could seem simplistic were an adult to speak in that way, they are fully capable of entering into a dialogue about the most important issues in life, ideas that lie at the very centre of the Torah and of Judaism.

Is there an order to things or does the universe operate in random fashion? Why do some people act virtuously and others tend towards bad actions? Where is God and what happens after I die? Such inquiries, which constitute the core of any moral quest for understanding, reflect the concerns that lie at the heart of a child's world — meaning, predictability, security, justice.

Young children almost exclusively express themselves in play and fantasy rather than in scientific facts or abstract ideas. Here's a brief story written by a 9-year-old girl. It is analyzed in David Heller's wonderful book, The Children's God.

"Once upon a time in heaven, God woke up from his nap. It was His birthday, but nobody knew it was His birthday but one angel. And this angel rounds up all these other angels, and when He gets out of the shower, they have a surprise party for Him."

In story form, this girl is expressing a desire to be the special angel, the one who serves God in a special way. The story makes the divine approachable by describing God in terms of ordinary human activities — sleeping, bathing and so on.

It is primarily in this way that kids, especially younger children, play out their deeply filled thoughts and anxieties about meaning and morality. And when we pay attention and feed back to them, perhaps by discussing with them how their story can be understood in Jewish terms, we have the making of a real spiritual dialogue between parent and child and the beginnings of an identification with the Jewish World view.

When a child asks a specific question about a specific topic, whether it is about Passover or about why people steal, they are not simply looking for a answer to their question. What they are testing out is how do you think, Mommy and Daddy, about the world. They are absorbing how we analyze situations, what we value, what kind of language we use and how we understand reality. Each specific question they ask us carries with it this larger baggage.

So, as we answer their specific question, we should be aware of how they are learning to think about life from our response, and that sometimes the most trivial topic can leave a large impact on children.

Each time we link a topic to some kind of Jewish idea or teaching, we imprint on our children the fact that for us, Judaism is essential in how we negotiate the world, and hence it becomes an important tool and foundation for them to understand reality as well. If, in our answers, we begin to quote Jewish sources, as opposed to say, the newspaper and television, then they will both consciously and unconsciously learn to seek out Judaism as a source of wisdom, or at least recognize that it is a source of wisdom for their parents who are the key figures in their life. In truth, that is the most important Jewish education they will ever receive.

Jewish Life

Remembrance, celebrations

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On the 5th of Iyar (May 12 this year), Israel will celebrate its 49th year of independence. And even if you can't make it to Jerusalem for the official celebrations, you can still join the party thanks to the Jewish Highway.

But before the Yom Ha'atzmaut festivities begin, Israel observes Yom Hazikaron. This is the day dedicated to the memory of those who have made the ultimate sacrifice for their country. At 11 a.m. on May 11, sirens throughout the country will wail to proclaim two minutes of silence for the country's fallen soldiers and the civilians who have become victims of terror.

Unfortunately, this year has seen its share of tragedies. In February, the collision of two Israeli Air Force helicopters killed 73 soldiers [http://www.iconet.net/public/info.htm]. In March, seven schoolgirls were murdered by a Jordanian soldier while they were on a field trip to the Jordan Valley [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/14.Mar.1997/]. And a week later, two women were killed and dozens of others injured when a suicide terrorist detonated a bomb in a crowded Tel Aviv cafe [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/21.Mar.1997/].

In addition, thousands of war veterans have been permanently disabled since the founding of the state. You can learn more about their loss and their attempts to reintegrate into society at the site maintained by the Israel Defence Forces Disabled Veterans Organization [http://www.inter.net.il/~zdvo/]. For a personal view of Yom Hazikaron and how it inspired a Commitment of a Lifetime, see [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/yomzik.htm]. And in The Never-Ending Story, one father explains how he came to terms with the tragic loss of his son. [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/holidays/memorial/].

As the sun sets on Yom Hazikaron, the mood in Israel shifts from sorrow to joy as Yom Ha'atzmaut begins. Why not start the day with a rousing rendition of Hatikvah? You can listen to four versions of Hatikvah at the Israeli-Jewish-Yiddish-Hebrew-Folk Cultural Music Midi Free Library [http://members.aol.com/israelmidi/index.html#FOLK]. While you're listening, you can read a fascinating article about Israel's national anthem [http://merlion.singnet.com.sg/~ruthlee/tqvhmain.htm]. And you can find sheet music and lyrics to the national anthem at [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/facts/state/fstate1.html].

At the same site, you'll find an explanation of some of the country's other national symbols, such as its flag and the menorah. In addition, there's also the full English text of Israel's Declaration of Independence. If you prefer, you can hear David Ben-Gurion read some of it to you in the original Hebrew (using RealAudio) or you can even watch a two-minute documentary about Ben Gurion and the Declaration of Independence at [http://shani.net/israel-independence]. (In order to properly view this video clip you will need a powerful computer with a fast Internet connection. And you'll need to download the free VDOLive Video Player from [http://www.vdo.net/download/].)

And for thoughts about the religious role of the Jewish State, take a look at [http://torah.org/learning/yomtov/isrlindy.htm] or take a listen to [http://www.613.org/independence.html]. There, you'll hear lectures from such speakers at Rabbi Berel Wein and Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre [http://www.wiesenthal.com/index.html].

So Israel is having a birthday and you don't know what to send her?

Don't worry. How about sending your best wishes for many, many more years of health, prosperity and peace. [http://shani.net/israel-independence/greet.html].

Have a very happy Yom Ha'atzmaut.

The new Russia

Resurrection: The Struggle for a New Russia* by David Remnick (Random House, $36).

Lenin's Tomb, David Remnick's remarkable and eloquent chronicle of the Soviet Empire's demise, was awarded a coveted Pulitzer Prize in 1994.

In Resurrection, he takes on the new Russia — a country in the painful throes of post-Communist transformation. As in his former book he presents the reader with a vast panoramic picture and skillfully turns "reportage into history and history into reportage."

Remnick's account begins with the portentous meeting of the leaders of 11 Soviet Republics in December 1991, at which time the Soviet Union came to an inglorious end and Mikhail Gorbachev was sent into political oblivion.

Boris Yeltsin, lost in his cups, had to be helped from the room. His inept leadership had led to widespread crime and corruption. By 1996, his popularity rating had sunk to single digits. His cronies and political allies had become rich, but the country was adrift. Life expectancy for men had plunged and public health was close to chaotic.

The war against the Chechens which his minister of defence had assured him would be over in two hours, eventually led to more than 80,000 casualties.

What about anti-Semitism in present day Russia? The notion that Solzhenitsyn is anti-Semitic — a charge sometimes levelled against him — is regarded by Remnick as preposterous.

Vladimir Zhirinovsky is dismissed as a buffoon whose anti-Jewish rantings are not to be taken seriously. On the other hand, Genedy Zyuganov, leader of the Communist Party of the Russian Federation, is regarded as a potential threat. He recently wrote, "The ideology, culture and world outlook of the western world are becoming more and more influenced by the Jews scattered around the world. Jewish influence grows not by the day, but by the hour. The Jewish Diaspora...is becoming more and more the owner of the controlling interest in all the stocks of western civilization and is socio-economic system."

Remnick concludes that anti-Semitism has no political attraction as many feared it would. He indicates that Zyuganov's national bolshevism and other anti-Semitic, anti-western platforms have repelled most Russian voters — no matter how disappointed they are with Yeltsin.

The author maintains that Russia must find its way back to political stability; wage war against corruption and crime and create a middle class through the more equitable spread of wealth. If these changes are not made it faces inevitable decline and breakdown. He reminds us, however, that, "unlike China, whose population is still dominated by rural poverty and illiteracy, Russia is an increasingly urban nation with a literacy rate of 99 percent."

In the end, all things considered, he is surprisingly optimistic about Russia's future. He is convinced that its prospects over the coming years and decades are more promising than ever before in its history.

This book, unfailingly interesting, anecdotal, knowledgeable and written in a popular style, is warmly recommended.

CORRECTION

In Rabbi Bernard Baskin's review of Holocaust literature (April 24), he indicated that Vera Schiff, author of Theresienstadt: The Town the Nazis gave to the Jews, was sent with her parents to Theresienstadt in 1948. That date was incorrect. The correct date should have been 1938.

Race relations committee explores future in megacity

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The North York Race and Ethnic Relations Committee is pushing for a meeting with other Metro area anti-racism committees to formulate a plan to ensure their work will continue under the new megacity.

"I'd like to see a [megacity] committee to deal with these issues [of equity and racism], with quarters, staff, directors and volunteers," said Morley Wolfe, chair of North York's anti-racism committee.

Given Metro's diverse population, "in order for people of so many backgrounds to live together properly, there should be maintenance of race relations professionals to make sure no one is left out or discriminated against," he said.

With the planned amalgamation of six Toronto-area cities into one new "megacity" on Jan. 1, 1998, the future of the cities' anti-racism committees and that of Metro is unclear.

Metro Chair Alan Tonks, who heads the transition team to smooth the way to the new megacity, said a key issue in the planned merger is continuity.

Anti-racism committees in the Toronto area are leaders in formulating pro-active programs to counter racism and ensure equity. "One of the tasks of the transition committee is to identify these kinds of initiatives and make sure they are not lost in the shuffle," he said.

"These kinds of structures should find a new form in the new government," Tonks added.

Tonks was speaking shortly after a meeting of Metro's anti-racism, access and equity committee. One of the items on the committee's agenda was discussion of a study prepared by Canadian Jewish Congress, titled From Marches to Modems: A Report on Organized Hate in Metropolitan Toronto.

The report surveyed the racist agenda in Metro and made a number of recommendations, including continued anti-racist education and countering racist propaganda on the Internet.

The committee heard deputations from Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber; Karen Mock, representing B'nai Brith Canada and Antoni Shelton of the Urban Alliance on Race Relations. The committee has voted to accept the recommendations in the Congress report.

It was also scheduled to hear a presentation from former school teacher Paul Fromm, who is contesting his dismissal by the Peel Board of Education for violating its race relations policy. Fromm's failure to appear prompted caustic remarks from councillor Jack Layton.

"Ultimately the racist is a coward," he said. "You've got to wonder where these cowards are."

Following a request by Mock, the committee voted to support a September symposium on racism planned by B'nai Brith. It also voted in favor of encouraging broadcasters to air anti-racist messages and to investigate ways of distributing anti-racism materials to the public.

JF&CS 'THIRD SEDER'

More than 180 Toronto seniors gathered during Passover for a "third seder" lunch, sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service's chaplaincy program. Among the enthusiastic dancers to music provided by Mickey Lewin was 88-year-old Edith Uscier from the Achavat Achim Residence, and her partner, staffer Nitzan Sahar. [Photo by Myer Gordon]

Jewish volunteers among North York honorees

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish volunteers were among those honored last week by North York city council as part of National Volunteer Week.

Anita Feldman was honored for her volunteer work with Meals On Wheels, as a teacher's assistant and library aide at her children's school, and at Temple Har Zion, the Ontario Breast Screening Program, the Ontario Community Support Association, Red Cross blood clinics, and the Niagara Symphony during the five years she lived in St. Catharines.

Louis Goldenberg, 83, has volunteered with the Bernard Betel Centre for 27 years. Among his interests there are the High Holy Day Committee, political events, members' council, the Abuse Education Project, and representing the centre at the Alliance of Seniors to Protect Canada's Social Program.

He was also founder and first president of the Earl Bales Seniors' Centre and and is active with the North York Seniors' Games.

Rita Grotsky founded the self-help support group People with Schizophrenia, and has since been active in organizing meetings, leading discussions, finding speakers and contacting isolated survivors, hospitals, doctors' offices and social service agencies.

She has also volunteered for Baycrest Hospital, Meals on Wheels, the Canadian Mental Health Association and the Bernard Betel Centre, and the Canadian Mental Health Association.

Edes Sarner has helped out at the North York West Unit of the Canadian Cancer Society, and has assisted at the Adult Basic Literacy Class at Firgrove Public School.

She has also volunteered for Northview Heights Secondary School, the Canadian Red Cross, the Sudden Infant Death Syndrome Foundation, the North York Harvest Food Bank, Baycrest Centre, Branson Hospital, Canadian Institute for the Blind, and Temple Sinai's Nursery for Retarded Children.

Mayor Mel Lastman praised the winners as "incredible people who give selflessly of their time, energy and effort to make our community a better place to live, work and play."

He noted that the honored volunteers range in age from 16 to 87, and have given over 177 years of service and more than 275 hours per week combined.

The North York Volunteers of the Year Awards were established in 1984 to acknowledge and encourage volunteerism in the city.

Rothschild to receive WZO award

TORONTO — Kurt Rothschild, world chair of the Mizrachi Movement and president of the Canadian Zionist Federation, will receive this year's 1997 Jerusalem Prize for Jewish Education in the Diaspora, presented annually by the World Zionist Organization's Torah Education and Culture Department to a lay leader who has made major contributions to the advancement of Diaspora Jewish schools.

The Jerusalem Prize selection committee, chaired by Judge Yaakov Bezek, announced the award.

The Jerusalem Prize will be presented to Rothschild by the president of the State of Israel, Ezer Weizman during Yom Yerushalayim celebration on June 4.

The awards committee said Rothschild "symbolizes the unity of the Jewish people and is respected and revered by all streams in the Jewish community."

The Canadian Technion Society is pleased to invite you to join our Guest of Honour, Art Eggleton, Minister for International Trade, in support of Technion's Art Eggleton Canadian Centre for Molecular Medicine Research.

The Canadian Technion Society is pleased to announce the establishment of the Art Eggleton Canadian Centre for Molecular Medicine Research at Technion in Israel. The Centre is headed by former Torontonian, Dr. Karl Skorecki, a world renowned doctor and scientist. Dr. Skorecki and his team are focusing their research on the genetics of the kidney and the diseases which effect kidney function. Using leading edge technology, these scientists analyze abnormal genes and their building blocks in order to develop gene therapies that will target treatment of disease directly at the molecular level.

STEELES
MEMORIAL CHAPEL
TORONTO'S JEWISH COMMUNITY CHAPEL
Over 69 years of Traditional Service

A MANY-SIDED APPROACH TO MEETING YOUR NEEDS

We live in an age when the Jewish community finds confidence and support in having a choice. We recognize that you as individuals appreciate seeing alternatives in matters which deal with the heart and family ties.

Because of that keen awareness for your needs, Steeles Memorial Chapel wants you to know that we always endeavour to provide you with helpful options in your funeral arrangements.

We are able to deal with your needs in ways that provide the fullest service, handling every detail that arises. Or we can show you some very affordable arrangements which are more modest, in keeping with your requirements and preferences.

Our many years of service to our community has shown us that empathy and flexibility in setting out the most appropriate arrangements for your needs are key elements in our widely based service. We are near, guiding you through the complexities, giving you workable options and making life a little easier, a little more comforting.

הכל פורח, חשמש רכה ונעימה , באוויר אפשר להריח את פריחת ההדרים, האנשים בתכונה של לפני פסח. אני מדפדף בעיתון למצוא ידיעות משמחות, מעודדות, אבל קשה. עמוד ראשון: "חזרה ליסיעור - חזרה לכאב". "מצצה פוליטית-המלצה להגיש כתב אישום נגד נתניהו". "הפלשתינים מקימים תעשיה צבאית." ובמנים - אונס קטינות, זנות בגיל 12, כל הדברים שמוכרים עיתון ערב. אספתי מקבץ קטן שיש בו משהוא שמספר על הלך הרוח של ישראל 97 :

"שופט זיכה קצין שירות בתי הסוהר שניסה לנשק קצינה נגד רצונה - הוא רק שוביניסט גס רוח, אבל בהחלט לא סוטה מין". "זוועה בראש העין: גופתה של נסיה סוצין, עולה חדשה שנפטרה, חובאה על ידי חברה קדישא לחדרו של ראש העיר כמחאה על שלא קבלו את משכורת פסח... לא האמנו שיהודים יעשו דבר כזה אמרו בניח של הנפטרת". "חרדה במושב תלמים: רב המושב, הרב יוסף דידי פוטר וגורש מן המושב, וארבעה אנשים מתו תוך שבוע שלא כדרך הטבע. עכשיו תושבים מצעיים לוועד לפנות לרב ולבקש את סליחתו". "מאות דגי קרפיון ננגבים מבריכות הקיבוצים לקראת פסח" ממש לפני שאני מתייאש וזורק את העיתון לפח, אני מוצא ידיעה אחת חיובית ומקדיש לה פינה מיוחדת:

RALLY AGAINST WAR CRIMINALS

One is too many. That's the message residents of the Greater Toronto Area will be sending the federal government on May 22.

The rally to support prosecution of alleged Nazi war criminals in Canada, at 7:30 p.m. at North York City Hall Council Chambers, 5100 Yonge St., is being co-sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region, and UJA Federation. All members of the community are urged to attend.

The Toronto event, one of many across Canada designed to increase public awareness of the issue, has been planned to coincide with the federal election campaign.

"It's an ideal time to impress upon voters and candidates the importance of this issue," explains Moshe Ronen, Chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region.

Federal Justice Minister Allan Rock has stepped up the government's pursuit of alleged war criminals in response to requests from both Jewish and non-Jewish groups.

Bernie Farber, Congress' Director of Community Relations, called the location of the rally symbolic, citing North York as home to the largest concentration of Jews and Holocaust survivors in Canada.

UJA Federation and Congress would like members of other ethno-cultural faith communities to attend the gathering as well. "All Canadians have much to gain from ridding the country of anyone found guilty of crimes against humanity," says UJA Federation President Sandra Brown. "We must all take responsibility to ensure the country we live in is not known as a safe haven for war criminals."

Efraim Zuroff , director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Jerusalem, will deliver a special address. The Centre is devoted to identifying and tracking down Nazi war criminals.

Zero hour approaching to prosecute

There could be thousands of Nazi war criminals living in Canada according to expert Irving Abella who chairs the Canadian Jewish Congress War Crimes Committee. "As each day passes," says Abella "the likelihood of finding and prosecuting them is greatly reduced."

In 1986, a Royal Commission report released by Justice Jules Deschenes provided federal investigators with the names of 250 alleged war criminals, but to date, only one man, Jacob Luitjens, has been deported. Abella and others want to know what happened to the rest.

A recent request for information by Congress representatives on the status of war crimes investigations was turned down by the government.

Although there are currently twelve cases working their way through the judicial system, which Abella notes is four times more than in the last five decades, calls for justice to be served are becoming more urgent.

"This is the last opportunity any government will have to move against war criminals," Abella warns."Many of these men are nearing the end of their lives and without immediate action on the part of the government, they will die without having answered for the thousands of innocent lives they took."

According to Abella, the key years for successful prosecution of suspects were 1986-1995 when most of them were still alive and relatively healthy as were the witnesses against them. "Not prosecuting them in these years," says Abella, "meant not prosecuting them ever."

Holocaust survivor and veteran UJA Federation volunteer Mike Rosenberg is glad to see some government action even though he feels it's fifty years too late. "I commend the government for finally doing the right thing, but they must move expeditiously."

As the War Crimes Unit and Federal Justice Minister Allan Rock intensify efforts in this area, thousands of Jewish and non-Jewish voices across Canada have already begun to demand more action. Public rallies in major Canadian cities began on May 4 and will continue throughout the month, ending with one in Toronto on May 22, at 7:30 p.m. at North York Council Chambers.

WOMAN ABUSE: MORE THAN MEETS THE EYE

A leading expert on woman abuse in Toronto's Jewish community believes the number of reported cases is only "the tip of the iceberg."

Gail Gould, Supervisor of the Woman Abuse Program at Jewish Family and Child Service, says more than 300 women come to her office each year reporting physical and mental abuse caused by their husbands and common law partners. But Gould feels there are many more victims who don't come forward for help because they are too embarrassed and concerned about the consequences of their actions.

On Tuesday May 20, Jewish Women's Federation and the UJA Federation Women's Campaign are sponsoring Sounds of Silence: Issues of Woman Abuse in the Jewish Family, to help raise community awareness about the problem and to inform women about the options available to them. The panel discussion, at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue at 7:30 p.m., will feature Gail Gould, Rabbi Mark Dratch and Marsha Sfeir, a specialist in wife assault education.

Rabbi Mark Dratch

"Jewish women are in greater denial," explains Gould, "because of the stigma attached to this type of victim in the Jewish community. They experience enormous shame in admitting their husbands are either physically hurting or mentally abusing them."

Alysa Golden, who heads a national research project to gather information about the problem of woman abuse in Jewish communities across Canada, confirms Gould's observation.

"I believe there are thousands of Jewish women who are victims of abuse," she said. In fact, preliminary research conducted by Golden, using U.S. statistics and a demographic study published by UJA Federation in 1995, shows the number of abuse victims could be anywhere between 10,000 and 12,500 women in Toronto alone.

U.S. studies indicate 20-25% of women will encounter abuse at some point in their lives.

"The problem is most of them are too scared to tell anyone about what they're going through," says Gould.

A 1990 Jewish Family and Child Service study indicates Jewish women stay in abusive marriages twice as long as women in the general population.

"Most of us want to believe this sort of thing doesn't happen in Jewish homes," says Gould. She also points out female financial dependency and the desire to maintain peace at home, also prevent women from speaking out. "Many victims feel tremendous guilt about breaking up the family and therefore prefer to suffer in silence."

In spite of the taboos and shame, Gould reports receiving several calls a week from women reporting abuse in addition to the 300 women JF&CS serves yearly. The agency also runs programs to help male abusers and children who are abuse victims.

The important message to get across to the community is "wife abuse is no longer something that has to be kept a family secret," says Gould. "Women need to know they have the right to express their anger and that someone is there to listen."

A Matter of Class

Jewish school for the 90s

A Matter of Class is a regular column profiling supplementary schools affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education of UJA Federation.

Har Zion Religious School is doing whatever it can to accommodate the hectic lives of Jewish families in the 90s.

"Our number one priority is making it easier for families with all kinds of needs to obtain a quality Jewish education," explains Principal Chari Schwartz.

The school, which runs classes from junior kindergarten to grade ten at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill, was the first to launch an innovative two-day a week program in 1995. Instead of attending classes three times a week, as most supplementary programs require, students come on Tuesdays for Hebrew instruction and Saturdays for both Hebrew and religious study.

Schwartz says the shortened schedule "cuts down on demands for working parents to drive their kids to school," while maintaining a "high quality of instruction." Har Zion also integrates Saturday courses in language and religion to provide both students and teachers with curriculum reinforcement and what Schwartz calls a "better flow."

But integration at Har Zion doesn't end there. Schwartz is particularly proud of the school's commitment to children with special needs. "We find ways to sensitize the classroom and provide whatever support we can," explains Schwartz. Additional support includes everything from extra staff to braille books for visually impaired students. "We do our best to make all kids feel part of the class."

For older students, the senior school combines informal programming with family education reflecting the popular trend for parents to learn with their children. "Jewish education doesn't end after the bar or bat mitzva," notes Schwartz. Programs such as Parent Teen Dialogue, and guest speakers "engage students to go beyond their formal learning."

Har Zion also has an extensive music program which includes weekly music lessons for all grades and three choirs. "Music is an important element to convey the spirit of Jewish education," Schwartz observes.

For more information about Har Zion or any other supplementary religious schools in the Greater Toronto Area please call the Board of Jewish Education at (416) 633-7770

TORONTO TO CELEBRATE ISRAEL'S 50TH

Julia Koschitzky, one of the Jewish world's most respected leaders, will be heading the Toronto steering committee to plan community celebrations for Israel's 50th anniversary next year. Koschitzky, whose term as Chair of the Keren Hayesod Board of Trustees recently expired, decided to take on the task, after a request came from Israeli consul general Jehudi Kinar. He has asked UJA Federation to coordinate Toronto celebrations.

"Israel's 50th Jubilee offers our community a remarkable opportunity to collectively demonstrate the centrality of Israel to our lives, to reinvigorate our relationship with Israel and to involve thousands of community members, especially the young in this historic undertaking," Koschitzky said.

The steering committee, composed of representatives from Greater Toronto area Jewish organizations, will be the central coordinating body for local festivities. It will be working closely with an operations committee and a consortium of individuals, who will form a Parliament-like structure representing every segment of the community. The first steering committee meeting is scheduled for May 13.

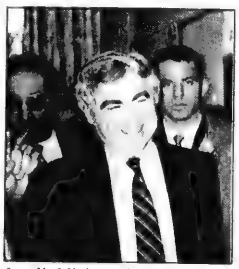
ISRAEL 50TH JUBILEE
YOUR DATE WITH HISTORY

In Israel, planning is already underway for an unprecedented celebration on April 30, 1998 - Yom Ha'atzmaut - at Ramat Gan Stadium, with 50,000 participants - many from Canada and the United States. The show will be produced by Gary Smith and David Wolper, the men behind opening ceremonies at the Atlanta Olympics. Wolper has received 150 awards during his career, including 2 Oscars and 50 Emmys. The Ramat Gan spectacular will be broadcast by satellite to North American cities. "We should never underestimate how much Israel means to our lives and how strongly it has defined our Jewish identity," noted Koschitzky. "For thousands of years, we have been bound to Israel by emotional and spiritual ties. Next year, we will not only be celebrating a major milestone, but our eternal link to Israel."

Prime Minister's Mission: The other side of Jewish life



Israel's Minister of Education Zevulun Hammer visited an ulpan class in Moscow with the Mission.

A group of top UJA Federation supporters recently sampled a taste of Jewish life they had never experienced before.

Participants on the Prime Minister's Mission to Moscow, St Petersburg and Israel, got up close and personal with Russian children learning their first Hebrew words, and teenagers preparing to make aliya, thanks to the UJA Federation-funded Jewish Agency. The group also met Israel's ambassador to Russia and key people who ensure that Jews in the former Soviet Union can live Jewish lives.

While visiting participants in the Jewish Agency's Naaleh 16 program, which sends Russian teens to live in Israel, often without their parents, mission members even had the chance to meet Israel's Minister of Education Zevulun Hammer.

UJA Federation Campaign Chairman Leo Goldhar said he witnessed many "acts of bravery," by Jewish Agency personnel and small children who often have to venture into unsafe neighbourhoods to attend school.

"These people sacrifice so much just to live Jewish lives," observed Goldhar, who travelled with wife Sala. "It made me realize more than ever how important it is that we do whatever we can to help."

Annette and Richard Pivnick were equally moved by what they experienced. "That could have been anyone of us," noted Annette. "Seeing how much people value their Jewish freedom and how hard others work to make that possible was very inspirational."

While in St. Petersburg, hundreds of items of new clothing, collected by UJA Federation's Fashion Division, were given to the Joint Distribution Committee and a Jewish Agency youth club. "Some of the younger kids put their Canada T-shirts on right away," recalled Abe Glowinsky, co-chair of UJA Federation's Business Cabinet. "It was very rewarding to see the smiles on their faces."

UJA Federation's Campaign Chair Leo Goldhar (right) and Business Cabinet co-Chair Abe Glowinsky (left), present Joint Distribution Committee representative Paulina Mendelevich with clothing items collected by UJA Federation's Fashion Division. Toronto's Laurie Cohen and Jeff Alter co-chair the ongoing drive.

Leo Goldhar shares an afternoon snack with children at a daycare centre in Kfar Gvirol, a UJA Federation-funded Project Renewal site.

Israel highlights included visits to Canada Centre in Metulla, and an aliya absorption centre in Tiberias, where participants met with recent arrivals from the former Soviet Union. "Our whole experience came full circle when we saw how the people we had met in Russia preparing for aliya were being settled in their new home after they made aliya," Glowinsky recalled.

About 60,000 Jews are expected to leave the former Soviet Union for Israel this year.

The group also visited the controversial Har Homa site in Jerusalem where they heard a debate between Media Watch director, Yisrael Medad, who supports housing construction at Har Homa and Palestinian Daoud Kuttab, director of the Al-Quds Institute of Modern Media, who opposes it.

UJA Federation sings choir's praises

$85,000 raised for Orly fund

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The third annual Dance for Orly competition did more than keep alive the memory of Orly Watkin, a 15-year-old girl who died of meningitis three years ago.

It also raised $85,000 for the Orly Watkin Meningitis Research Fund at Sunnybrook Hospital.

The event took place at the Minkler Auditorium of Seneca College. Groups of dancers from eight dance schools, 350 youngsters in all, competed in jazz, tap and ballet.

The Orly Watkin trophy, for the group that gave the most cheerful and lively presentation, was presented by Orly's sister Tali, to Danceology from North York.

Other prize winners were All That Dance, North York; Coffey's Danc'n Place, Brampton; Creative Dance Workshop, Oshawa, and The Dance Exchange, Oakville.

Orly Watkin's father, Shlomo, established both the dance competition and the research fund.

A media release explains that "Orly was a dancer for most of her short life. In fact, only two days before her death, she won four gold medals at a regional dance competition at York University."

Scientists at Sunnybrook Hospital are studying the bacteria streptococcus pneunoniae and neisseria meningitidis, considered the leading causes of meningitis.

Their research has shown that across Canada, both bacteria are becoming increasingly resistant to penicillin and other antibiotics, the media release warns.

Dr. Andy Simor, director of microbiology at Sunnybrook, who accepted the cheque from National Ballet principal dancer Karen Kain, and his colleagues are also studying newer antibiotics, more rapid diagnosis of the disease, and extending surveillance of the bacteria that cause meningitis across the country to determine how they spread.

Jewish book awards announced

TORONTO — The Jewish book awards committee of the Koffler Centre of the Arts recently announced the winners of the 1997 Canadian Jewish Book Awards.

Eleven authors will share $5,000 in prizes in nine categories ranging from fiction and poetry to history, biblical scholarship and Holocaust writing published in Canada in the last two years.

As a highlight of awards night, May 27 at 8 p.m. at the Leah Posluns Theatre, Canadian actress-singer Theresa Tova will read selections from some of this year's winning works.

Anne Michaels wins the Martin and Beatrice Fischer Prize in Fiction for her acclaimed novel, Fugitive Pieces (McClelland & Stewart), while Carol Matas will be awarded the Rachel Bessin-Frisch Memorial prize for Young Adult Fiction for After The War (Scholastic).

Laurentian University professor Roger Nash wins the Henry Fuerstenberg Poetry Prize for his recent collection, In The Kosher Chow Mein Restaurant (Your Scrivener Press), while Seymour Mayne and Glen Rotchin win the Louis Lockshin Memorial Award for their edition of Canadian poetry, Jerusalem (Vehicle Press).

The Koffler Centre President's Prize will be awarded to Manny Drukier for his Holocaust biography/memoir, Carved In Stone (University of Toronto Press), while The Yad Vashem Prize for Holocaust History goes to Dr. Felicia Carmelly for Shattered: 50 Years of Silence (Abbeyfield Publishers), a history of the Holocaust in Romania and Transnistria.

The Harry and Florence Topper Foundation-Milton Shier Award for Translation from Yiddish goes to poet Simcha Simchovitch for A Song Will Remain (Lugus).

The Betty and Morris Aaron Prize for Scholarship on a Canadian Jewish Subject will be awarded to Concordia University professors Mervyn Butovsky and Ira Robinson for their essays on Montreal's immigrant Jewish community, Renewing Our Days (Vehicule Press), while Rabbi Steven Saltzman wins this year's Penina Rubinoff Memorial Award for Biblical Scholarship for A Small Glimmer of Hope: Reflections on the Book of Genesis (Ktav).

The Joseph and Fay Tanenbaum Award for Canadian Jewish History will be shared by Québécois historian Yves Lavertu for The Bernonville Affair (Robert Davies Publishing) and Vancouverite Fraidie Martz for Open Your Hearts (Vehicule Press), the story of the Canadian Jewish community's absorption of war-era orphans.

GOLDFARB SCHOLARSHIP

Bialik Hebrew Day School recently announced the establishment of the Marina Goldfarb Yabrov Scholarship fund to provide a $500 scholarship each year to two Bialik graduates, a boy and a girl, who are planning to study in Israel. The scholarship will be offered yearly by Dr. Liudmila and Lev Goldfarb in memory of their daughter, Marina (right), a Bialik graduate. For more information, call Sonia Shron at 783-3346.

Beth Tikvah marks 30th year

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the past three decades, Beth Tikvah Synagogue has grown from a fledgling group of 85 young families to a 1,000-family congregation recognized for its musical programs, educational programs and even a perfume-free sanctuary section, all of which have won awards from United Synagogue, the umbrella group for Conservative congregations.

The Bayview Avenue facility, which houses a branch of United Synagogue Day School, has been partially refurbished for its 30th anniversary this year. Recent enhancements include attractive new doors for the chapel entrance and the sanctuary ark.

But it's the "involvement of the membership and the commitment of the lay participants to expressing their Jewishness in every way possible" that has most impressed Stuart Razin, director of fundraising and director of adult-centred activities, in the 22 years he's worked for the shul.

The synagogue's lengthy participation in the fight to free then-Refusenik Anatoly Scharansky — lobbying, holding rallies, raising funds — exemplified, for Razin, "the best Beth Tikvah can offer...You feel good when you're in the presence of these types of people."

Rabbi Wayne Allen, Beth Tikvah's spiritual leader for the past decade, characterizes the congregation as "musical, active, challenging, dynamic, energetic, to a large degree Judaically knowledgeable, and committed."

Beth Tikvah dates back to 1964, when Shaarei Tikvah congregation was begun by 18 families; they later merged with the Bayview Synagogue Association.

Rabbi Herbert Feder was hired as Beth Tikvah's first spiritual leader in 1967, but it wasn't until 1971 that the current building was completed and the congregation was able to move out of its portable home. Following Rabbi Feder's aliyah in the early 1980s, Rabbi Robert Marcus became spiritual leader for five years, preceding Rabbi Allen.

Since its inception, Beth Tikvah has placed an emphasis on music, with three or four major musical programs every year. According to Heather Shapero, chair of the board and first vice-president, Beth Tikvah was the first Toronto synagogue to have a composer-in-residence, Srul Glick, who also conducts the synagogue's two choirs.

More recently, the congregation has been innovative in a different way, becoming the only synagogue in town to offer a choice of caterers. The transition was lengthy, costly and complex, but the response has been "very good" and all four caterers are getting business, said Shapero.

In honor of Beth Tikvah's 30th anniversary, scheduled events are geared to "try to reflect the areas of interest Beth Tikvah has highlighted over the years," said Merle Goldman, chair of the 30th anniversary program committee.

A March concert by Israeli singer Chava Alberstein was the kickoff event, also marking the 18th anniversary of the Toronto chapter of Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University. A lecture series began in March with Professor Arnold Ages discussing artist Marc Chagall; writer Vanessa Ochs spoke on Women's Spirituality and lawyer Sergio Karas is scheduled to speak May 15 on the Swiss and Holocaust History. The series will continue in the fall.

Five years ago Goldman, then president of the shul, wrote about Beth Tikvah's future on the occasion of its 25th anniversary. "We have built a community where education, music, prayer and a sense of community have become pillars of this congregation."

Among her dreams for Beth Tikvah's future were "sufficient self-confidence to allow for alternative expressions of prayer...maybe even an egalitarian minyan."

That hasn't happened, although there have been changes over the past decade: women are now permitted to open the ark, have an aliyah for maftir, and lead Kaballat Shabbat services.

There have been expanding roles for women," said Rabbi Allen. "Within the confines of a respectful adherence to Jewish law, we try to find as many opportunities as possible.

When it comes to services for "adults with a different religious orientation," he noted, "I would say our synagoguge has wisely determined that prayer should not be an issue for divisiveness."

Some members might draw different conclusions, but according to Shapero, only "a small group" is interested in studying the option of egalitarian services.

"We're reasonably traditional," said Beth Tikvah president Earl Biderman. "It's not something we're likely to change quickly. I don't foresee an egalitarian service, but short of that, there are many opportunities to provide alternative service approaches for interest groups within the synagogue."

Rabbi Allen sees Beth Tikvah as "a place where people can grow, develop and learn in a nurturing, friendly and caring environment where open-minded inquiry is welcome and adherence to tradition is our hallmark."

Wheelchair fails to stop Mazor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Dan Mazor

TORONTO — Still a novice at manoeuvering his hi-tech sip-and-puff wheelchair, Dan Mazor gamely negotiates an outdoor path on the attractively landscaped grounds of West Park Hospital, where he is undergoing intensive rehabilitation following a fluke accident that paralyzed him below the neck last October.

His front wheel veers onto the soft grass bordering the paved walkway. Mazor, 30, glances in the rear-view mirror mounted on the wide left armrest of his wheelchair – the same model used by paralyzed actor Christopher Reeve. He sips from the hefty chair's delicate-looking mouthpiece, causing it to move backward onto the path, then inches forward again by blowing into the straw.

Again, the wheel goes astray. Back and forward; back and forward. His mother, Dorit, summons a staff member to help, but in the end it's Mazor who puts himself back on track — a small victory in his ongoing effort to regain a measure of independence.

When his rehabilitation is complete, he hopes to resume his career as a music producer. At West Park, he's learning to operate a computer by using a straw-like device similar to the one that controls his wheelchair. The new skills will enable him to translate his musical ideas into reality using existing computer technology.

Before his accident, Mazor co-ran his own company, Prime Time Studios, producing CDs such as the eponymous Paul London and contributing songs to Dance Mix USA.

Mazor's world changed last October, on the fourth day of a week-long vacation to Cuba when, standing in knee-deep water, he was struck and flipped by a powerful wave, likely the aftermath of a hurricane off the Florida coast. Only the night before, he had played keyboard with the hotel band in an impromptu jam session.

"I must have hit my neck on a sand bar, and that's it. Over," recalls Mazor.

An alert lifeguard rescued and resuscitated him, but he would need resuscitating twice more, as well as surgery to stabilize his damaged second and third vertebrae before he could be flown out of Cuba. His father Jerry flew down to accompany him by air ambulance to Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre here, where he was to spend three months in the Neurological Intensive Care Unit. He has returned to Sunnybrook once for a bladder infection, not an uncommon complication.

Now one of his biggest priorities — and challenges — is weaning himself from his ventilator, a necessity if there is a problem with the equipment and medical attention is not immediately available. With the help of a respiratory therapist at West Park, Mazor has progressed from two minutes to 2½ hours of breathing on his own.

Physiotherapy, to stretch the muscles he can no longer work himself, is also part of his routine. "Sometimes we go roller blading," he jokes.

Before his accident, Mazor didn't know anyone who used a wheelchair. "Actually, it intimidated me," he said.

But a visit by a quadriplegic who heard about his accident and drove himself to Sunnybrook in a specially equipped van gave Mazor courage and hope. "It showed me there's still a life."

Supportive family and friends have played a big role in maintaining his positive attitude, Mazor said. His parents visit daily, his brother Ron, almost as often.

Ron and his wife Raina have organized a benefit performance at Comedywood later this month to raise money both for him and for the Richmond Hill-based Canadian Spinal Cord Research Organization (CSRO), which is seeking a cure for paralysis.

About 1,100 new spinal cord injuries occur yearly in Canada, according to the CSRO. Costs to families and the government run into millions of dollars over each lifetime. A van equipped for someone like Mazor would cost about $50,000 (US), said a CSRO representative.

Mazor eschews self-pity, preferring to work toward the day he can re-integrate into society, resume his career, visit friends and attend concerts. "Once you come to understand your limitations, it's not so bad.

"It's not so good," he amends quickly, with a laugh, "but you know what you can and can't do, and for me there's more that I can or can try to do, than I can't. My mind and the way I think are still the same."

AN IMPORTANT MESSAGE FROM STATE OF ISRAEL BONDS

Israel Bonds is a strictly apolitical organization that has always had but one mission – to build and develop the State of Israel.

WE HAVE WAITED TOO LONG and worked too hard for a Jewish homeland to make our support for Israel contingent on the issues of the day, as important as they are. We are not talking politics or ideology, but the human needs of fellow Jews; social services, employment, housing, medical care, immigration and absorption. The long term projects we support – highways, telecommunications, energy, air and seaports – must be funded and cannot be stopped each time there is a disagreement. THIS IS THE ROLE OF BONDS. Like any democratic country, Israel will always have its share of controversies. Nonetheless, the independence of modern Israel and its economic strength in our lifetime is A MIRACLE THAT MUST BE SUSTAINED.

Fiddler helps CSRO fundraiser

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — To celebrate the 25th anniversary of the opening in Toronto of Fiddler On The Roof, the play's film version was screened recently at the Eglinton Theatre, followed by a gala reception at the Four Seasons Hotel.

The fundraising event for the Canadian Spinal Research Organization (CSRO), hosted by director and producer Norman Jewison, was chaired by Michelle Levy with a special guest appearance by Israeli-born actor Chaim Topol, who portrayed Tevye the Milkman in the film and the stage productions on Broadway, London and on tour.

The mood for the evening was created by volunteers garbed in shtetl-like clothing. Supporters were treated to Yiddish and klezmer music with a performance at the reception by singer-actor Theresa Tova.

Jewison, who has received 12 Academy Awards, introduced the film and spoke of CSRO's achievements. The organization was founded by people with spinal cord injuries, in order to raise funds for scientific and medical research.

Award-winning filmmaker Norman Jewison (left), Michelle Levy, and Chaim Topol are seen at the fundraising reception for the Canadian Spinal Research Organization.

"Increasing awareness and raising necessary funding is critical as we strive to find a cure for people with spinal cord injuries," says Levy.

"This one-time only gala screening will help us reach our goal."

Topol divides his time between London and Israel. He told The CJN that this was the first time that he viewed the film from beginning to end.

"I cried a lot — I was immersed in the show," he said. "When I played the role of Tevye 25 years ago, it was before my three children were married. Now that I experienced the marriages of my children and have grandchildren, I appreciate every year that goes by."

Married 40 years, Topol says that he now understands the significance of the film. He added that "it was wonderful for me to view the film at this time of my life."

Spokesperson for CSRO Wendy Crawford-Burton was a 19-year-old model on her way to the Toronto Pearson airport in 1984 to catch a plane when a drunk driver rear-ended her car. She was hit in the back of her neck by her suitcase and has been paralyzed from the shoulders down ever since.

She explained that the average age of those with spinal injuries is 19. More than 30,000 Canadians have spinal cord injuries. Crawford-Burton thanked the supporters and noted that since her injury 13 years ago, many things have changed and progress is being made through research. "But we still have a long way to go."

Jewish soul needs proper nourishment

By JASON YOUNG

TORONTO — In many ways the Jewish soul is like the stomach, in that when you feed it, it grows and desires more. It needs more learning, more philosophy, more struggle.

Opinion

If you take the Jewish soul and starve it, at first there's a little bit of hunger, but after a while it shrinks and doesn't require as much food.

When we go to university, we require Jewish nourishment. We need a certain amount of Jewish culture to sustain us. Whether or not we get it determines how we will end up four years later and where our lives go.

The 19 Jewish student unions (JSU) across Ontario, all the way from Windsor to Ottawa, are the restaurants at each campus where our Jewish souls go to get nourishment.

These restaurants are run by the chefs, who are the JSU executives and presidents.

They prepare the meals and serve the menu at each of these restaurants. How good they are and how good their ingredients are defines how strong the Jewish program at each campus is.

This brings us to Kol Hastudentim, the council of chefs from each of these restaurants. We got together one day and said, "People are still walking out of our restaurants hungry. Something is not being satisfied." In some cases, they're very hungry. In some cases, they just need certain areas.

We know that when you walk into a restaurant, sometimes you want a coffee, sometimes you just want a piece of cake, and sometimes you want a whole dinner.

When kids go away to campus, it's exactly the same situation. Everyone wants something else. Some people just want the cake, and some people want the whole meal.

What we have to be able to do as leaders on campus is to provide what's asked of us. Not by the greater community, but by the students themselves because they're the ones that are going to decide if they come to the programs or not. They're the ones that we have to listen to when they tell us what they're looking for.

So when we got together as this council of JSU presidents and executives, we decided what was missing from our menus, and we came up with some solutions.

Problem number one was that not every restaurant was serving every dish being asked for. Some people want things that aren't on the menu.

One solution was to let each restaurant know what the other restaurants are serving, so that people know where to go to get them. In real terms, I'm talking about intercampus communication, using e-mail and phones and whatever means we have including the Web to get the campus programs advertised to each of the other campuses.

There's a huge difference this year from last as far as intercampus cooperation in programming. We've seen programs at Waterloo where buses came in from McMaster and Guelph. We've seen programs at McMaster where buses came in from Toronto and London. We've seen the Purim party in London where buses came in from the other schools.

All of these small campuses that only have the resources to serve a few dishes at their restaurant specialize in those dishes and then each campus lets their students know about what's being offered elsewhere.

Since Ontario has 10 or 11 different universities along one strip of the 401, it's very easy for people to jump back and forth between these restaurants and get the meal they're looking for. That's what's been happening this year, and that hasn't happened in past years.

Solution number two was, two or three times a year, to provide a feast for everyone, a feast of dishes not offered anywhere else. These include the Holocaust education trip we organized in October, the ski retreat that we called Fire and Ice, which was in December, and Ontario-wide shabbatons this year, which Guelph ran by itself.

Problem number two is that not all restaurants have great food. This is either because the chefs have training and ability but lack some ingredients, or they have the ingredients and resources but they're lacking a little training and they're fresh out of chef school.

Our solution to this is to bring all these chefs together at least once a year in addition to the existing leadership development programs, and make them better chefs, give them more ingredients, make them better at what they're doing. In real terms, again, that's the mega-conference that is coming up in May, which is for all of the Ontario schools.

We're not the leaders of tomorrow any more; we're the leaders of today. We're trying to bring people together. That is a very deep part of what Kol Hastudentim stands for.

Jason Young, a University of Toronto student, is the chair of Kol Hastudentim. This is an excerpt from his CJC plenary speech.

Calgary's B'nai Tikvah marks double anniversary

By MELANIE COLLISON
Special to The CJN

CALGARY — Temple B'nai Tikvah has come a long way in the past 18 years. From a handful of families meeting in the basement of a member's home, the Reform synagogue has grown to 200 families.

Members and friends of Temple B'nai Tikvah gathered recently for a dinner at the Palliser Hotel to celebrate what MC Debbie Baylin called "the joys and oys" of temple.

For Temple B'nai Tikvah, this was a double anniversary — celebrating 18 years since the synagogue's founding and 10 years of spiritual leadership by its rabbi, Jordan Goldson.

Among the 170 celebrants at the dinner were several rabbis who travelled long distances to share in honoring the temple's founders and its rabbi.

Rabbi Dan Gottlieb, past executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), and who has been instrumental in helping create vibrant Jewish congregations across Canada, characterized Temple B'nai Tikvah as "a community of dedicated and seriously committed religious Jews, with a unique contribution to make."

Rabbi Paul Golomb, regional director of the CCRJ and Rabbi Art Benjamin, current president, travelled from Toronto to join the celebration, along with incoming president Nancy Bercovitch.

Rabbi Don Goor, who as a student rabbi often visited Calgary to officiate at temple services, came from California "to celebrate with a congregation and a rabbi that are very dear to my heart." It was Rabbi Goor who encouraged the newly ordained Goldson to consider accepting the job at Temple B'nai Tikvah 10 years ago.

Chazzan Norm Yanofsky praised Rabbi Goldson for developing temple programming and Jewish education, for his special sensitivity towards potential converts, and for his musicality.

Congregants presented Rabbi Goldson with gifts, including a new tallit. In thanking the congregation, the rabbi said: "When I put on my tallit, I am reminded that when we are dealing with everyday life, we do so enwrapped by God.

"When I go out to [rabbinical conferences] representing this congregation, I am enwrapped in its love and support. It is with a sense of awe that I describe what you are doing to make Judaism a force in Western Canada."

Windsor JNF dinner set

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

WINDSOR — Windsor's Jewish community will honor C. Yves Landry, chair, president and CFO of Chrysler Canada Limited at its National Fund (JNF) Negev Tribute Dinner on June 17 at the Caboto Club.

Keynote speaker will be former Ontario premier Bob Rae. Solicitor General Herb Gray, himself a former Windsor Negev Dinner honoree, will present the JNF citation.

Proceeds from the dinner will go towards the Chrysler Canada Arboretum within JNF Park Jerusalem 3000.

Landry and Michael Walker, director of government affairs at Chrysler Canada, who recently returned from a brief tour of Israel as guests of the JNF, were enthusiastic about the country, said Windsor JNF executive co-ordinator Sharon Kaplan.

Landry, born in 1938 in Thetford Mines, Que., worked in the asbestos mines from the age of 16 in order to pay for his education at Laval University. He graduated with a masters degree at 20 and held senior sales positions with two major Canadian oil companies before he turned 30.

Landry joined Chrysler Canada in 1969 as regional sales manager in the company's Quebec office in Montreal. In 1990, he was named president and chief executive officer.

Convinced that industry and education must work together to meet the next century's challenges, Landry was instrumental in establishing Canada's first Automotive Research and Development Centre in 1994.

He is a recipient of numerous awards and academic honors.

Dinner chairs will be Dr. Paul Cassano, vice-president of the University of Windsor, and Gerald Freed, a former Windsor Negev Dinner honoree.

Debating champs

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Adrian Leipsic and Michael Kives, Canadian national debating champions know how to talk the talk.

The two students attend St. John's-Ravenscourt (SJR) School, noted internationally for its debating program which begins in Grade 8.

Kives, a Grade 10 student, was persuaded to enter the debating program by his classmate, friend and debating partner Jason Quinton.

"I wasn't interested at first," he says. "I entered as a team with Jason in our first competition. Because another team dropped out though, we were split up."

Not only did Kives finish first as an individual, he also finished first as part of a team and by the end of Grade 8, he qualified for the national competition in Halifax. He was the youngest competitor and finished first in his category.

Last year, he won the national championship again, making him the first person to win championships two years in a row.

In October, he placed first in the Western Canada National Debating Seminars and in March, he won the right to represent Manitoba in the National High School Debating Seminars in Halifax, which take place at the end of April. If he finishes in the top five, he will qualify for the World Debating Seminars scheduled for Jerusalem next January.

Leipsic, a Grade 12 student, also began debating in Grade 8.

He won the national public speaking championship in impromptu speaking, which was held in Winnipeg and led him to participate in the International Independent Schools Public Speaking Championship in London, England. He finished second in a field of 60 students from several different countries.

Next year, Leipsic is planning to enrol at McGill University, which is also well known for its debating program. He is interested in pursuing a career in either law or literature.

Kives is also considering a career in criminal law.

THE BORINS BEAT

We Can't Spell S ccess Without "U". I am happy to report that the final phase of the very successful three-year capital campaign in support of the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre has begun. As you know the Centre will be completed soon with a final cost of $7.7 million. Teams of energetic and committed volunteers are now hard at work raising the remaining necessary funds to complete the Battle Centre.

We have asked people with influence, most with philanthropic experience, to join us for this specific period of time to help Reena achieve its financial objectives. I always let volunteers know that fundraisers are the catalyst and that they have the privilege of relating to those generous, special people who want to help others in their community.

Named gifts encourage others to give. They create a wonderful memorial to the act of philanthropy and the good works of the special people and corporations in our community. A unique piece of art encompassing sight and music has been created to recognize those members of the community who find it within their hearts and resources to support Reena.

The Battle Centre will be a modern, fully equipped adult day centre purposely designed to provide a wide range of services and activities for thousands of adults with developmental handicaps in the communities of Metropolitan Toronto and York Region. It will also assist families by teaching life skills, providing a respite and support to loved ones cared for at home, and offering a better quality of life for the whole family. The centre is located in the City of Vaughan, the fastest growing community in the Greater Toronto Area. It is a highly visible, fully accessible facility on Clark Street, just west of Bathurst Street, close to public transportation and other community services and activities.

Reena touches the lives of thousands of people each year. Its clients come from many cultural backgrounds. Our services are, accordingly, multi-cultural and inclusive. Reena was established in 1973 from the dreams of a concerned group of parents and quickly became a strong voice, addressing quality-of-life issues for children and adults with developmental handicaps. Today, Reena is the second largest provider of residential services for people with developmental handicaps an the Greater Toronto Area.

The Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre is already recognized internationally. Scores of community groups have expressed interest in participating at the new, fabulous, well-equipped centre. Requests for assistance, information and training have reached us from Winnipeg, Israel and United States. There is great need for centralized information and training. This will provide exposure for Reena and its supporters that is unprecedented!

I am pleased to be part of this exciting time at Reena, a milestone in the 24 years of Reena's wonderful history. A better community is everybody's business to ensure a healthy and civil society.

The JNF/Reena Golf Tournament takes place June 18th at the Royal Woodbine Golf Club. JNF co-chairs are Marilyn & Sheldon Berg. I recall their efforts for the 1995 Negev Dinner tribute to Leslie Dan, B.Sc. Phm. Call Lil at the JNF ((416) 638-7200) to reserve your spot and register. It's always great to see Marilyn, Sandy Poslins & Judy Wilson on their visits to Reena.

I love hearing from groups like the Grand Slam Bridge Club, "where good friends meet," who have generously selected Reena as the charity of choice to benefit from its special week of bridge activities May 25-31. Call your hosts John or Nick Bruno at (905) 771-9723.

Next time, more about Phil Droznika, Amherst Pharmacy, (416) 258-2022, & Gary Starr, Countrywide Silverstarr Realty Inc., (416) 218-1117, each of whom have special charity golf tournaments planned this summer.

Great to see that Norm Gardner has entered the federal race as the Progressive Conservative candidate to represent Willowdale in the soon-to-be announced federal election.

Did you catch the headline in the Toronto Star "Canada's film producers now world class players", referring to Alliance Communications and Paragon Entertainment. Yasher Koach to Jeff Rayman, Allen Karp, Gerry Schwartz, Alek Grossman, Joe Rotman, Syd Cooper, Jon Sian and Richard Borchiver.

Jerry Borins is the Capital Campaign Director for the Reena Foundation's Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre in Vaughan. The Centre will ensure people with developmental handicaps realize their full potential. The $7.7 million campaign will be successfully completed in May, 1997. Call Jerry at (416) 787-9554

Red River Flood

Dike building unites community

By MATT BELLAN
The Jewish Post and News

WINNIPEG — Local media have been calling it the Flood of The Century, making it sound like a Hollywood natural disaster movie.

Indeed, the camaraderie of dike-building, and the feeling that "we're all in this together" has given the growing Red River flood here a bit of a carnival-like air.

But for Winnipeggers buying sump pumps to fight water backup in their basements or building dikes to protect riverside homes, the flood that's slowly edging into parts of the city is anything but fun.

It's heartening to see how organizations and individuals in the Jewish community are lending a hand, sometimes with the help of non-Jewish agencies. Dozens of students from Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate helped fortify dikes along Scotia Street.

Students from that Jewish high school, Jewish youths from other city schools and Jewish adults also pitched in last week, as water levels rose. Omnitsky Kosher Foods and Bathurst Street Market also generously donated kosher for Passover snacks for Jewish volunteer dike-builders on Scotia, with the Salvation Army transporting and delivering the food.

Amid all the preparation, some Jewish Winnipeggers waxed nostalgic last week about the last big flood the city experienced, in 1950.

Shirley Barsky, wife of the late Dr. Percy Barsky, recalled moving with her family to Winnipeg from Halifax in February 1950, as an unmarried girl.

"We bought a house on Glenwood Crescent" on the east side of the Red River, "and moved in May 1," she said. "We moved out May 7. Water was gushing in."

Rose Knight remembers "people were getting inoculated for something – I don't know what...There was such pollution when the water went down...I lived on Alfred Avenue. We didn't have any water, that I can remember, but everyone was so scared."

Evelyn Hecht, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's community relations director, recalled that during the 1950 flood, "they shut down the schools in the city."

Her future husband, Larry Hecht, had to go with his sisters to his family's cottage in Gimli for three months. "It was awful."

"I remember, I was a kid, and we were building a home on Smithfield, but the lumber floated away," Evelyn Hecht added.

Prof. Elliott Levine had little time for nostalgia last week, as he tried to protect his and wife Zelda's home on Kingston Crescent from rising floodwaters. But his family managed to preserve its sense of humor during a seder night in that house.

"My son-in-law joked that he wanted the floodwaters to come, so God would come, and part the waters."

As for the possibility that the rising Red might disrupt the Jewish community calendar a bit, an older member of the community put that fear to rest.

"I know it sounds cruel," the organizer of a Sunday afternoon Yiddish concert responded, when told many Jewish Winnipeggers might not be able to attend because of flood preparations. "But people can still take off an hour and a half and come see the concert. Yiddish is important, too!"

NORTH DAKOTA TOWN FLOODED
A utility truck makes its way through the waters of the Red River in downtown Grand Forks, N.D. This tiny Jewish community has been hit hard by recent flooding in the Red River Valley. The entire city, including some 50 Jewish families, was forced to evacuate as a result of the natural disaster that struck before Passover. B'nai Israel Synagogue, the only Jewish institution in Grand Forks, incurred some damage to its library, basement and social hall. But the sanctuary, prayer books and Torah scrolls are intact, Robin Silverman, president of the 58-year-old Reform synagogue, reported to the Union of American Hebrew Congregations. Red River Flood

'Unusual things keep happening'

By MATT BELLAN
The Jewish Post & News

WINNIPEG — For Marie Lavitt, one of the biggest changes has been the noise.

"It's been stressful," said the North End Jewish resident, who lives with husband Larry and three young children only three houses away from the swollen Red River.

"Unusual things keep happening," Lavitt explained late last week.

"Helicopters are flying overhead three or four times a day....And the pontoon boats on the water make a lot of noise. There are constant reminders you might be in harm's way."

For the Lavitts and other Jewish families living on or near Winnipeg rivers, the ongoing "flood of the century" poses an unusually immediate threat.

But a wide variety of Jewish organizations have been pitching in, in response to the emergency. Meanwhile, local media announced the Red River had crested May 2 without causing any serious flooding in this city, protected by dikes and a floodway, but was expected to remain at that maximum level for about a week.

The Jewish Foundation of Manitoba (JFM)late last month contributed $10,000 for flood relief, joining forces with the Thomas Still Foundation and Winnipeg Foundation, which provided $10,000 each.

"We feel the Jewish community should participate equally with everyone" in funding relief efforts, said David Cohen, JFM's executive director.

"We're part of the broader community," Cohen added, noting that the JFM "reached out" to the other two foundations, suggesting the joint effort. Of the $30,000 in donations, $15,000 will go to the Manitoba Division of the Canadian Red Cross, and $15,000 to the Salvation Army in support of its flood relief efforts.

Among other things, the money will help pay for food for volunteer sandbaggers and Manitobans displaced by the flood.

B'nai Brith Canada is setting up a fund to help the more than 24,000 Manitoba flood victims evacuated from their homes. The organization announced it will collect new and used clothing and charitable donations.

Donations can be sent to B'nai Brith Foundation — Manitoba Relief Fund, 370 Hargrave St, 2nd floor, Winnipeg, R3B 2K1 or to its national office at 15 Hove St. North York, Ont. M3H 4Y8.

Tax receipts will be issued for all donations.

Robert Freedman, executive director of The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) said a food donation was made to the Salvation Army. "We gave them crates of apples, oranges, fruit juices and soft drinks for people working on the dikes."

Senior staff members from the WJCC and the YMHA Jewish Community Centre have also met over the past few weeks with Sharon Home personnel to discuss "contingency plans" for the Jewish nursing home near the Red River, should any residents have to be evacuated.

But Freedman, Hecht, and Daniel Ruth, the Sharon Home's chief executive officer, stressed that there was only a slim chance residents would have to be evacuated.

"Flooding of the Sharon Home is extremely remote," Ruth confirmed, adding that the river would likely have to rise "another nine feet" to reach the nursing home's property.

As for other Jewish community facilities near Winnipeg rivers, Freedman said the Asper Jewish Community Campus, near the Assiniboine River just east of Assiniboine Park, is in "pretty decent shape."

Meanwhile, about 300 people showed up at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue recently to build a sandbag dike at the northwest corner of the synagogue parking lot, Sandy Tapper, Shaarey Zedek's executive director said.

Groups gear up for election

And the Canada-Israel Committee (C-IC) is encouraging groups and individuals to inject advocacy on Israel into the campaign. National executive director Rob Ritter says issues include Canada's positions on Jerusalem and the settlements, and Israelis claiming refugee status here.

CJC's guide, assembled under Prof. Gerald Gall in Edmonton, will be sent to all the main political parties to indicate where Canadian Jews stand on five major areas: international affairs, social justice, community relations, Israel and national unity.

Those areas in turn break down to discuss Holocaust reparations; refugee and immigration policies; the social safety net; anti-Semitism and racism in Canada and in its military; employment equity; hate on the Internet; membership of Israel's Magen David Adom in the International Red Cross; and national unity.

Late last year, the Quebec region of CJC joined the province's Greek and Italian communities in calling for "urgent" action to renew federalism and recognize Quebec's distinctiveness.

The initiative was called Three R's to National Unity: Reconciliation, Recognition and Renewal. As its title implies, the coalition wants Ottawa to patch up wounds left by the 1995 referendum, by recognizing Quebec's uniqueness and rejuvenating federalism. But it stopped short of calling for constitutional entrenchment of distinct society status for Quebec.

National unity is the "key" issue for Montreal Jewry, says CJC Quebec region chair Reisa Teitelbaum.

The city's community is "feeling vulnerable. [A] priority in other parts of the country is not necessarily one here."

The region will be holding "power lunches" with candidates from all parties, she said, and is considering presenting larger events touting unity with its Greek and Italian coalition partners.

CJC's election guide will also be sent to all Congress regions for use at the local level, says Eric Vernon, director of CJC's Ottawa advocacy office. Vernon says Jewish communities are encouraged to use the guide to formulate questions for candidates.

BBC's task force will try to meet as many candidates as possible before the election, says Lisa Armony, director of the group's institute for international affairs.

Beginning next issue, The CJN will bring readers complete election coverage, including riding profiles and, it is hoped, interviews with the leaders of all the major parties.

Rock defends party's record

Rock defended the Liberals' record, but conceded, "I'm sure we have not done enough." He said he told the religious leaders that Ottawa plans "a strong moral commitment to the effort, a recognition that action is needed, and a commitment to intensify the effort we have made, where the evidence justifies it."

He said that in addition to the 12 deportation cases the Liberals have started, additional cases will be initiated "in the months ahead," and that efforts will be made in the immigration department to ensure that Canada does not become a haven for modern-day war criminals.

Ottawa "is going in the right direction. We have a strong and firm resolve to proceed. Resources will not stand in the way."

Asked by The CJN whether the Liberals can ever deliver on deporting suspects, given that three of them have died of old age since 1994, Rock said "it's for the courts to decide."

Rock said there was discussion of a public apology for Canada's past inaction, but "I think what's owing is that we use the opportunity to do everything possible on the moral imperative...I put the emphasis on action. The best way we can honor the memories of those who died is to take action."

Weizman, Arafat scheduled to talk peace

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Second meeting between the leaders

JERUSALEM — In an effort to give new momentum to the stalemated peace process, President Ezer Weizman was to meet this week with Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat.

The meeting was to take place on the Israeli side of the Erez checkpoint at the entrance to the Gaza Strip, the President's Office announced.

This is the second time Weizman has intervened in the peace process. He invited Arafat to his Caesarea home last October, after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu failed to set a date to meet with the PA head.

Netanyahu then announced a meeting and met with Arafat before Arafat had met with Weizman.

Sources said Weizman's current move has been closely coordinated with Netanyahu, via contacts between cabinet secretary Danny Naveh and Weizman's bureau chief, Arye Shumer. Foreign Minister David Levy was also involved.

Weeks of international diplomatic efforts, particularly by U.S. coordinator Dennis Ross, who was said to have played a pivotal role, preceded the announcement of the meeting. Also involved in efforts to bring the sides together were the Europeans, particularly European Union envoy Miguel Moratinos, who is currently visiting Israel, the sources said.

Meanwhile, Netanyahu was to meet with Levy and Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai earlier to discuss the peace process prior to Ross's arrival.

Arafat flew to Egypt last Sunday to meet with President Hosni Mubarak, a visit Palestinian sources said is aimed at coordinating a position in advance of the expected resumption of talks.

Despite the crisis between the government and the PA, Weizman continued to keep the lines open. Shumer, who had been in contact with Palestinian leaders over the weekend, met with Arafat adviser Ahmed Tibi to finalize details of the meeting. The official announcement of the breakthrough followed shortly afterward.

Tibi said later that the Palestinians are placing their hopes on the president's ability to help patch up the tensions between the two sides.

These, he said, were caused by the decision to go ahead with the Har Choma building project and "the unfortunate decision with regard to redeploying [in the West Bank by] only by two percent." But these were not the only problems, he said, and the meeting was intended to ease the "overall tensions."

Arafat was interested in meeting with the president, Tibi added, because Weizman enjoys wide popular support, can influence public opinion, and has experience with the peace process.

As in his previous meetings with regional leaders at times of crisis, the president was not expected to make concrete suggestions, but rather to create a more relaxed atmosphere between the two sides and to pave the way for Netanyahu-Arafat talks, sources said.

"The peace process has to move forward. There is no alternative. I hope the [Weizman-Arafat] meeting will contribute towards this," Levy said before the meeting. He stressed, however, that the Palestinians would have to prove they are willing to take stronger steps to counteract terrorism and to cooperate with Israel in its prevention.

According to reporter Liat Collins, National Religious Party chair Hanan Porat was critical of Weizman's decision to meet with Arafat. Porat accused Weizman of involving the presidency in politics and blurring the boundaries between the branches of government.

Following Porat's comments, Collins said, MK Yossi Beilin, a candidate for the Labor party leadership, responded: "Porat expresses regret at anything that could further peace. I call on the president to continue his efforts to promote peace and in this way save the region from a political stalemate which will bring about a violent deterioration in the situation."

Bentsur said the final communique of the recent Malta Conference included a call by the 27 member states for negotiations between Syria and Israel to be resumed on the basis of the Madrid Conference.

The announcement was formulated with the consensus of all the states at the conference, including Syria.

Bentsur pointed out that the announcement was in keeping with a proposal Levy made three months ago that was rejected at the time by the Syrians. He suggested this might provide an opening for a bridging formula that would enable negotiations to resume.

The possibility of resuming talks with Syria on the basis of the Madrid Conference was expected to be discussed by Levy, Bentsur and Moratinos at their meeting.

Under the Labor government, the sides appeared on the verge of a Golan-for-peace deal, but it was never finalized. The Netanyahu government opposes a complete Golan pullout.

Bentsur told Israel Radio that Israel is open to renewing the peace talks based on the Madrid model, which imposed no preconditions on either side.

Netanyahu participated in the Madrid Conference as deputy foreign minister.

Blair sympathetic to Jewish concerns

By JOSEPH MILLIS
London Jewish Chronicle

LONDON — As 18 years of Conservative rule in Britain are swept away in a tidal wave of anger, discontent and frustration, Anglo-Jewry is waking up to the fact that the new Labor-led government will be the first in a generation to be without any recognizable members of the community.

Analysis

In addition, some of the community's better known political supporters — both Jewish and non-Jewish — are among the more than 170 Conservative parliamentarians who lost their seats in the May 1 elections that brought Prime Minister Tony Blair to power.

But Britain's youthful new premier can be expected to be sympathetic to the needs of the country's Jewish population.

A devout Christian and Britain's youngest prime minister since 1812, the 44-year-old Blair has close links with the Jewish community and sees Judaism's values and morals as mirroring his own.

Some of his biggest backers in the run-up to his landslide victory were prominent members of the Jewish community.

In addition, when they were young lawyers, Blair and his wife, Cherie, shared offices with Eldred Tabatchnik, who is president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, the community's national lay leadership organization.

The three have remained close friends ever since.

The new Labor government is expected to take a tough line on racism.

When it was in the opposition, the party had initiated legislation to make Holocaust denial illegal, in line with the policies of other western European countries.

Labor is also likely to support moves to tighten up legislation on the publication of racist and anti-Semitic literature.

Regarding the Middle East, there are likely to be few changes in Britain's stance, especially since the country is already thought to be among the friendliest in Europe toward Israel.

There will be few, if any, specific policy changes because these are governed both by the civil servants at the Foreign Office — once referred to as the "Camel Corps" because of a perceived pro-Arab bias — and by the joint policies of the European Union, with which Britain is now expected to have closer ties.

Robin Cook, the foreign secretary in the new Blair government, has been at pains to stress that there is little difference between the Labor Party and the Conservatives on Middle East policy.

Issues affecting the Middle East "shouldn't be a political football" between Britain's two main parties, he said.

Cook, who is from Scotland, will play a key role in Britain's negotiations for a new treaty among the 15 members of the European Union that is slated to be finalized next month.

Perhaps the most high-profile Jewish politician to lose in the Labor landslide was Malcolm Rifkind, the foreign secretary of the outgoing Tory government. He was once considered a candidate to take over the leadership of the Conservative Party.

Labor's Greville Janner, a veteran campaigner on behalf of the Jewish community, also will be missing from the incoming Parliament.

Janner, a member of the World Jewish Congress, decided not to run for another term.

Also gone is Conservative John Marshall, who represented a district in northwest London that has a large Jewish constituency.

Although not Jewish, Marshall was well liked by the community and spearheaded some parliamentary campaigns on its behalf, including a call for anti-racist legislation.

Of the 659 seats in the House of Commons, Labor won 419, giving it 179 more seats than all the other parties combined. The Conservatives won only 165 seats, suffering its heaviest defeat since 1832 and ending its 18 years in power that began with Margaret Thatcher's 1979 victory.

After losing, former Prime Minister John Major relinquished leadership of the Conservatives. There are now several contenders for the unenviable job of reviving the badly bruised party.

Although Britain has no sizable "Jewish vote," some of its 659 constituencies have a Jewish population that presumably swung to Labor — like most of the general populace.

U.S.: No evidence Arafat knew of Trade Center bombing

By HILLEL KUTTLER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Justice Department has dismissed a Jerusalem Post report alleging Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat knew in advance of the 1993 World Trade Centre bombing, citing a lack of evidence to back up the claim.

In a letter sent to Pennsylvania Sen. Arlen Specter last week, Assistant Attorney General Andrew Fois said the department "is unaware of any information that Yasser Arafat either had prior knowledge of the bombing of the World Trade Centre or was in any way involved in the conspiracy to bomb the building."

The Justice Department also asked Israeli officials about Deputy Education Minister Moshe Peled's claims of Israel's knowledge of Arafat's involvement, and "they [the Israelis] deny the accuracy of the statements attributed" to Peled, Fois wrote.

Specter wrote to Attorney General Janet Reno last month asking her to investigate the claims contained in the March 26 Jerusalem Post lead story. In the last Congress, Specter served as chair of the Senate select committee on intelligence.

A senior American official said that the United States never put any credence in the news report and has seen no intelligence indicating Arafat was in any way involved in the plot.

The Post report had quoted Peled as saying Arafat "was part of the discussions on the [World Trade Center bombing] operation," and calling on Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "to give the information to the Americans, so they'll know who they're dealing with."

PA lawyer arrested

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A lawyer working for the Palestinian Authority (PA) has been jailed in Gaza for writing an article about the Bar-On Affair that compared the PA legal system unfavorably to the Israeli system.

Jamil Salameh, who works at the Ministry of Planning, headed by Nabil Shaath, wrote the article for the Gaza Bar Association journal. But when he showed it to the journal's editors for publication, they passed it on to the public prosecutor, Khalid al-Qidrah, who ordered Salameh arrested.

He was arrested last week and is being held at the Gaza Central Prison.

It is the first time a writer in Gaza has been jailed by the PA for an unpublished article.

The article expressed admiration for the way the Israel Police investigated the Bar-On Affair and commented particularly on the investigation of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi.

Many articles published in the Palestinian press have said the same thing. However, Salameh went further, asking when such an independent legal system would be adopted by the PA, according to Bassem Eid of the Human Rights Monitoring Group.

Eid was speaking at a forum on the media and democracy organized by the Israel-Palestine Centre for Research and Information.

Al-Qidrah said that Salameh was charged with security offences, and that while freedom of the press was to be defended, this did not permit slander.

April 28

• IDF troops shot dead 18-year-old Issam Akabneh and lightly wounded another Palestinian during rioting in Haras Village near Hebron on Sunday night. Soldiers and border policemen were attacked with stones and firebombs. To disperse the rioters, soldiers opened fire at the Palestinians, resulting in Akabneh's death.

April 29

• Labor party leadership candidate MK Yossi Beilin held talks with Yasser Arafat in Jericho and offered a three-point formula for breaking the impasse in the peace process. Government spokesperson David Bar-Ilan said the government would not consider the proposal.

April 30

• Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said he had no plans for a cabinet reshuffle in the wake of the Bar-On affair.

• Jonathan Pollard petitioned Israel's High Court demanding the state disclose what is being done to secure his release from jail in the United States.

• Turkey's defence minister began an official three-day visit aimed at strengthening ties with Israel.

May 1

• Netanyahu announced the formation of a ministerial forum with members of the Likud, Gesher and Tsomet in a bid to build confidence in the government following the negative publicity surrounding the Bar-On affair.

• Soldiers and police forcibly removed two trailer homes illegally established near Mizpeh Jericho.

• Israel's soccer team defeated Cyprus 2-0 in a World Cup qualifying match, retaining the top spot in the qualifiers' fifth group.

May 2

• In response to media reports concerning Syrian attempts to acquire nerve gas weapons, Netanyahu said: "The Middle East is not about to explode...but we are watching things closely and are ready to respond. We do have answers."

Egyptian media at 'war'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

When Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was in Cairo recently for talks with President Hosni Mubarak, he invited Egypt's major newspaper editors for a tete-a-tete. Disdainfully rejecting his invitation, they added insult to injury by launching ad hominem attacks on Netanyahu in the form of blistering editorial comments and inflammatory cartoons.

Observers were hardly surprised. Since Egypt became the first Arab country to sign a peace treaty with the Jewish state in 1979, Israel and its leaders, their political affiliations notwithstanding, have been consistently vilified in the Egyptian press.

As a result, an entire generation of Egyptians has been weaned on a fairly steady diet of anti-Israel — and anti-Semitic — vitriol. At the very least, this hostility weakens Israel's pivotal relationship with Egypt and thereby contributes to the cold peace between the two nations.

Furthermore, since Egyptian newspapers are read throughout the region, it is quite probable that their nasty treatment of Israel and Jews has a negative impact on public opinion in the Arab world.

At a press conference in Washington last month, following the release of an Anti-Defamation League report entitled Anti-Semitism in the Egyptian Media, Mubarak was asked to comment on the subject.

Obviously prepared for the questions, Mubarak replied that he could not, nor would not, try to control Egypt's "free press." Then, to no one's astonishment, his aides released a booklet of unflattering Israeli press accounts and cartoons about Egypt that Mubarak described as "racist."

On the other side of town, meanwhile, Egypt's foreign minister, Amr Moussa, blithely told U.S. congressmen that the whole matter had been blown out of all proportion. How, he wondered disengenuously, could Arabs be anti-Semitic when they were Semites themselves?

In point of fact, the media in Egypt is notoriously anti-Israel and anti-Semitic. Islamic and Arab nationalist-oriented newspapers are the worst offenders. But, as the Anti-Defamation League report points out, mainstream, mass-circulation government-backed newspapers, such as Al-Ahram and Al-Gouhuriyya, can be equally as harsh.

In defaming Israel, the Egyptian press repeatedly harps on several themes, all too often blurring the differences between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism.

Israel is racist, militaristic and expansionist. Netanyahu is another Hitler. Israel seeks to dominate the Middle East through economic means. Israel is flooding Egypt with fruits and vegetables laced with poison. Israel is spreading the AIDS virus to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Israeli-made chewing gum, exported to Egypt, is intended to make Arab women promiscuous.

Judaism is a sinister religion, based upon blood rituals and cabals. Jews are trying to undermine Islam. Israel is the base of an international Jewish conspiracy.

These Nazi-like calumnies not only dehumanize Jews and delegitimize Israel, but constitute a major setback to the development of normal relations between Egypt and Israel.

Usually, anti-Israel and anti-Semitic rhetoric reaches a crescendo of intensity during stressful periods. In the 1980s, Israel was lambasted for bombing Iraq's nuclear reactor, annexing the Golan Heights, constructing settlements in the territories, invading Lebanon and trying to crush the intifadah.

More recently, Israel has been excoriated for refusing to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, blocking an investigation over allegations that Israeli troops killed Egyptian prisoners of war in 1956 and again in 1967, opening an archeological tunnel in East Jerusalem and building a residential neighborhood in Har Choma over the protests of the Palestinians.

Amid these developments, the Egyptian press is likely to step up its virulent campaign against Israel and Jews. Israel and Egypt are at peace, but you may not know it by reading Egyptian newspapers.

Diaspora Jews can help Israel's democracy

By IRVING GREENBERG

Forty-nine years ago, the Jewish people created a nation state.

The Jewish state was born in a cauldron of ethnic conflict and religious clashes. But despite its internal problems, Israel saw itself as the state of the Jewish people worldwide and felt an obligation to them. It took on responsibilities that transcended national boundaries.

Under the Law of Return, hundreds of thousands of individuals, even those who would have been excluded from other countries for medical or financial reasons, were admitted, taken care of and fully integrated.

Israel also acted as the guardian of persecuted Jews elsewhere and in effect, intervened in the domestic politics of other states in order to do so.

In turn, Israel was caught in a crossfire. It drew the wrath of Joseph Stalin for undermining the monolithic Soviet empire. Third World movements and radical blacks attacked the Jewish state as a way of attacking the westernized white world to which world Jewry belonged.

For their part, Jews worldwide gradually overcame their fear of being tarred with the brush of dual loyalty. Jews sang Hatikvah as their people's anthem, not stopping to get permission from the countries of which they were citizens.

They undertook to lobby national policies on Israel. They raised substantial funds to build Israel and they created a powerful network of links to Jews all over the world.

As an outgrowth of the pro-Israel policies, North American Jews eventually became leading supporters of foreign aid.

Similarly, the demand to intervene in oppressor countries to help suffering Jewish communities turned into disproportionate Jewish support for pro-democratic and interventionist foreign policies. No wonder the International Campaign for Tibet and recently, the nascent movement to check persecution of Christians worldwide turned to the Jewish community for help.

Out of deep attachments to fellow Jews and Judaism's classic teaching that no loyalty, other than to God, should be absolute, Jewry has developed a model to fight the negative aspects of nationalism.

This model is also good for the internal life of Jews. Ten years ago, the "Who Is A Jew?" controversy erupted. In defiance of the logic that democratic politicians must serve only their voters, Israel's political leadership derailed a law that was backed by local voters in favor of the counter needs and feelings of Diaspora Jews who had no vote in Israel.

Even now when the new law disqualifying non-Orthodox conversions in Israel appears to be irresistible due to the makeup of the ruling coalition, the objections of Diaspora Jews have exerted their influence. Many Knesset members are uneasy. A national unity government would likely stop the legislation.

North American Jews must bear down not only to affect this legislation, but to build multiple loyalties in Israel that will help it be a better democracy.

The concept of multiple loyalties also has helped make Israel the most magnetic, vibrant total Jewish environment in the world today.

The sense of profound intertwining of destiny remains one of the deep structures of Jewish identity. Therefore, study and living experiences in Israel are among the most powerful Jewish identity-affirming mechanisms.

Jews should reject the policies that use Israel's ox to gore North American Jewish denominations. They should equally resist calls to distance ourselves from Israel over these issues. Instead, North American Jews should determine how communal funds can underwrite a massive upgrade of Jewish identity through the Israel experience.

When all Jewish children are connected to Israel through living and study, they will be permanently connected to the Jewish people and the Jewish tradition as well. Thus, the next Jewish generation will be a force for internationalism and humane foreign policy even as it links the Diaspora and Israel — and Israelis and Diaspora Jews — in an unbreakable bond.

Canadian karate champ finds new life in IDF

By EDGAR ASHER
Special to The CJN

PARDESS HANNAH — He welcomes you like an old friend. Big creases appear near his mouth and at the corner of his eyes as he smiles and offers you his hand. From his gentle demeanor you would never guess that he is a world class karate champion. In fact, for three years, from 1992 to 1994, Yossi Schlesinger was the karate champion of the Canadian and American Association of Karate.

"You know I was a violent child," Schlesinger says in response to the comment that he does not appear to be very aggressive. "When I was six years old I used to get beat up a lot by the kids at school. I was a weak child. My mum said, 'Enough is enough, you've got to learn how to defend yourself from the school bullies.' So she enrolled me in a judo class near my home in Kiryat Yam [near Haifa]. I really took to judo, it gave me self-confidence and courage to face up to people and look after myself. It got a bit out of hand and I was using my newly learned skills aggressively."

Schlesinger was born in Kiryat Yam in 1971. In 1974, his parents divorced and Schlesinger and his mother moved to Canada. However, when he was six years old his mother decided to return to Israel.

"It was very hard for me," Schlesinger said. "I didn't have a father to help me and perhaps that is why I had this aggressive period after I learned judo. It didn't last too long because my grandfather sorted me out and got me in good order."

Just four months after his bar mitzvah, Schlesinger returned to Canada with his mother and his sister and settled in North York. He went to Northview Heights Secondary School and he decided to further develop his interest in sport by playing basketball and doing gymnastics. At the same time, he decided to take his martial arts passion a step further and he began to learn ju-jitsu and kung fu.

"Soon after I arrived back in Canada I heard that they were giving karate lessons at the Jewish Community Centre (JCC). I went and joined the karate class and I enjoyed it very much. Besides giving me body power, it gave me a deep inner peace. It enabled me to control my temper."

He continued to learn other arts similar to karate. By 1993, already a champion and a teacher, he had earned a third degree black belt in karate.

"The year 1993 was important for me because I came to Israel to represent Canada in the Maccabiah Games. Unfortunately, I was disqualified on a technicality. Anyway, I was so happy to be in Israel again that I decided I would come back for good and make aliyah. I never really felt at home in Canada. I just didn't feel Canadian. And I had dreamt since I was a teenager of becoming an officer in the Israeli army. When I came back and met my friends again, it was as though I had never left. My friends are like brothers."

Yossi Schlesinger

In December 1996, Schlesinger then 25, made aliyah, leaving his mother and sister in Toronto. Almost immediately, he applied to join the army.

"I was attracted to a career in the army because of my karate experience," he said. "Army discipline is the same as in the martial arts. Karate helps you under pressure. I wanted to join a cravi [fighting] unit and eventually train to become an officer."

Schlesinger's induction into the IDF was to be his first test of army discipline, because most of his immediate instructors were younger than he was and the new recruits were 18 years old. He joined an armored corps unit and after his basic training, he began his training on tanks.

"I had no problem being with younger guys. We were all friends together, we all helped each other. I am not saying that it wasn't hard at times, but even greasing a tank can be fun if you think it's necessary and important."

The IDF, as a people's army, has developed institutions that are unique. One such category is known as chayal boded (the single soldier). Many young people who are in Israel without their immediate family, such as children of Israelis living abroad are given this category. The army will help such soldiers in all aspects of their everyday life, including with additional financial help, rent accommodation and contribution towards other household bills. The chayal boded will also be given extended leave to go abroad and visit his family.

"The army is always ready to help me. After my basic training, I started learning all about tanks. There is always a distance between the officers and new soldiers, but we have a respect for each other. The discipline in karate helps me a great deal in the army."

When he is on leave, Schlesinger lives here in Pardess Hannah, about 13 kilometres south of Kiryat Yam where he was born. He rents a small apartment from the Kodoshi family.

"When I came back to Israel at the end of last year," he said, "I found a job in a large home and gardens supermarket near Pardes Hannah. Reuven Kodoshi was the manager of the supermarket and he soon became my adopted brother. Reuven had a son, also named Yossi, who fell in the 1973 Yom Kippur War."

Schlesinger would like to see more routine instruction in the martial arts in the IDF. "Apart from the obvious practical value as self defence, which is good for everybody, it teaches you to learn self respect and respect for others."

The first part of his dream has been fulfilled. He is confident that the long and difficult path to becoming an officer will also come about. He also dreams of one day representing Israel in international karate competitions. To this end, he has devised his own style of karate which he calls kihondo (the spirit of the mind).

IPO celebrates 60 years

By SARAH HERSHENSON
Special to the CJN

Opening of the Mann Auditorium, home of the IPO in Oct. 1957. Leonard Bernstein is conducting. David Ben-Gurion is at his side.

The Israel Philharmonic Orchestra (IPO) knows how to throw a party. The year 1996 marked its 60th anniversary and for two weeks in December, conductor Zubin Mehta, members of the IPO, and 17 of the music world's finest soloists celebrated with 12 star-studded performances.

All concerts were sold out and several performances were broadcast live on radio and television. Such was the atmosphere, that soloists even showed up at concerts at which they were not playing. "Are you having a night off?" Pinchas Zuckerman was asked. "No" he answered with a smile. "A night off is going to the movies." He was backstage, he said, to enjoy the wonderful event and the excellent music with family and friends.

"We are the 'Kosher Nostra' quipped Daniel Barenboim, pianist and conductor. Each soloist volunteered his or her services, including conductors Mehta and Kurt Masur; violinists Itzhak Perlman, Zuckerman, Isaac Stern, Gil Shaham, Shlomo Mintz, Maxim Vengerov, Ida Haendel, Mannheim Breuer, Ariel Shamai, and Ivry Gitlis; pianists Barenboim, Murray Perahia, Yefim Bronfman and Itamar Golan, and cellist Mischa Maisky.

Mehta, the IPO's lifetime appointed conductor, emphasized that the IPO and the soloists are like his close family. But, he continued, "No one has been closer to the orchestra than the violinist Issac Stern."

Stern came to the fledgling state 47 years ago to play his first concert with the Israel Philharmonic. "Two important things happened that year," Stern reminisced. "The first, of course, was the establishment of the State of Israel. The second was the feeling of pride to be a Jew — a person among persons, a state among states."

There was a feeling of "belongingness" in the air, said Stern, recalling one of his early concert trips to Israel. "When I got in a cab one afternoon and asked to be taken to some place other than the concert hall, the cab driver looked at his watch and turned to me, 'Don't forget you have a concert tonight, Mr. Stern.' People care, and that is one of the beauties of Israel."

The audience has remained loyal and supportive throughout the years, Stern said. "When the orchestra performed in the small and tattered Ohel Shem Hall that seated 920 people it did not matter. The hall was filled and half the people in the auditorium were in army uniform. Everyone listened from their pores."

Today the orchestra's home is in Tel Aviv at the Mann Auditorium, whose principal benefactor was American Fredric R. Mann, but the audience is as knowledgeable and enthusiastic as ever.

'Kosher Nostra'

Stern also recalls when the Siege of Jerusalem was lifted during the War of Independence and the first convoys of armor-plated buses could break through. The Jerusalem residents, he said, knew that other convoys were coming, but right now they needed music. Members of the IPO were in the first convoy, regardless of the dangers of attack.

A photograph, from the IPO archives, of the orchestra members pushing a bus that had broken down on the road leading to Jerusalem, shows their strength and determination.

In truth, the history of the Israel Philharmonic documents the history of the State of Israel itself. The orchestra was formed in 1936 by the violinist Bronislaw Huberman who persuaded 75 musicians from Europe to go and live in Palestine and play on the "sand dunes of Tel Aviv." The maestro Arturo Toscanini took leave of the NBC Symphony and conducted the IPO's first concert. "This is for humanity," he said.

On May 14, 1948, the IPO proudly played Hatikva at the Declaration of Independence ceremony. The orchestra's senior members recalled the concert in November of the same year for 5,000 war exhausted soldiers who sat on the sand dunes surrounding a newly liberated Beersheva. It was conducted by a young Leonard Bernstein with all the spirit and joy that were to be the trademarks of the man whose love of Israel and the orchestra was boundless.

Throughout the decades, the orchestra grew in prestige and in 1971, the IPO began participating in major European music festivals. Though there were heated discussions as whether or not to perform in Berlin, the decision was made to play, and Mehta led the orchestra in an enthusiastically received performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 1. When the cheers of "Encore, Encore" rang out, Mehta turned to the orchestra and declared "Hatikva." Thus our national anthem was played a few hundred meters from the Reichstag, where the annihilation of European Jewry had been planned.

"We have never left the podium," says Avi Shoshani, executive director of the IPO since 1973. "We have been here through wars and changes of governments. Mehta rushed to Israel during the Gulf War to conduct a memorable performance of the Mozart Requiem and Isaac Stern, gas mask in tow, conducted a concert during a Scud attack."

With concerts planned and soloists booked until the year 2000, the Israel Philharmonic looks forward to many more gala anniversary celebrations of music and friendship. A source of pride to all Israelis, the IPO is much more than just another orchestra. It is something unique in musical and Jewish history.

IPO members push their broken-down armored bus on the Burma Road en route to a performance in Jerusalem in 1948.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

Beit din arbitration becoming popular

By Jonathan Shiff

Moshe and Yaffa hired contractors to build a two-storey addition onto their house – basement and ground floor. Before the building was complete, they discovered significant faults in the work that require tearing down the whole addition and having it rebuilt.

Being religious people, and not trusting the courts to act speedily, the parties took the dispute to arbitration in front of three rabbis.

More than 18 months later, the rabbis have still not made a decision, but it appears they are going to find for the contractors.

If that is the final decision, Moshe and Yaffa will have no right to appeal or have a court review the decision.

The arbitrators will not even have to give reasons for their decision.

Danny and Rachel rented a store to a business which sells women's clothing.

After a few months the tenant stopped paying rent and ran off with items belonging to Danny and Rachel worth several tens of thousands of dollars.

The parties referred their dispute to arbitration in front of the Jerusalem beit din, and after several months of stalling on the part of the tenant, Danny and Rachel received a notice that the arbitrators had ruled against them since they did not appear for hearings.

They had never received notice of the phantom hearings.

The above stories are true, and will likely lead to years of costly litigation, in an attempt to overturn the decisions.

It wasn't meant to be that way: as in other parts of the world, the courts are overloaded and cases take years to complete.

It is natural, therefore, that arbitration has become a popular solution.

For religious Jews, the idea of allowing rabbis to decide disputes has an added appeal, since the secular courts are often regarded with suspicion.

The Knesset itself decided to encourage arbitration of civil disputes a few years ago by granting the courts the power, if the parties agree, to transfer lawsuits to arbitrators or to a procedure for making compromises.

In fact, the very same attributes which make arbitration efficient, can often bring on the nightmares described above.

The best way to ensure a speedy decision is to agree that the arbitrator is not bound by the substantive law or the intricate laws of evidence, and is not required to provide reasoning for the decision.

Furthermore, most decisions cannot be appealed unless there have been gross violations of a party's rights, such as if the arbitrator makes a decision without hearing both sides.

This should be a recipe for quick decisions which do not end up back in court.

On the other hand, if the arbitrator is not proficient in the subject under dispute, or if there is a conflict of interest, the results can be disastrous.

I know of one arbitrator who found for the plaintiff but so misunderstood the economic significance of the decision that the result was a huge financial loss due to what was essentially a mathematical error.

If a court had made such a mistake, the decision could have been appealed and reversed.

In this case, the plaintiff had no recourse.

On the other hand, it has become common for parties to large disputes over salaries, pensions and the like to refer the matter to an accountant, who is often able to make a quick decision based on a thorough understanding of both the law and the numbers.

Recent changes in the law in Israel also provide for alternate dispute resolution in divorce cases, and several lawyers have taken courses where they learn both the law regarding division of assets and the skills required to facilitate compromise between parties in an emotionally charged situation.

In such cases, arbitration can save significant amounts of money for the parties involved as well as years of heartache and litigation.

The savings to the court system are probably incalculable.

According to the Mishnah, there is a shortcut which is long, and a long way which is short.

It would be in the best interests of many people to try arbitration as a way to bypass the clogged courts and impatient judges who populate them.

At the same time, experience has made it difficult to recommend arbitration except in very specific cases.

For too many people, this shortcut ends up being very long and expensive indeed.

Yossi Arditi. A Portrait in Courage.

'It was very dark outside, with not even the moon to give us light, when the Molotov Cocktail hit the centre of the Jeep; the bottle shattered all over us and started to burn us. I was trapped in the back seat, burning like a living torch. Everything was burning. I managed to get out of the jeep. I had burns all over my body. I was hospitalized for 10 months and had countless plastic surgery operations. Through it all, my wife, children, parents and friends were by my side.

I had to stay in bed for six months. During this time I was introduced to Beit Halochem in Tel Aviv. I initially visited the Centre for physiotherapy and then learned there were many more activities. Beit Halochem became my second home. Everyone made me feel very comfortable because everyone was in the same boat. I felt protected and cared for. I have no doubt that Beit Halochem helped me in the best way possible. There were days when they actually helped me forget my dreadful injuries.

From the bottom of my heart, I want to thank those who thought of the idea of establishing a place like Beit Halochem, for those of us who have suffered injuries and are now disabled. I want to thank those who manage it, and those who contribute to it with such generosity.'

Cohen overcomes her disability to help others

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Like thousands of others, Sheri Cohen has been coping with learning disabilities that are invisible yet affect her in a number of ways.

Because of what she herself has had to cope with, she understands the unique needs of individuals with learning disabilities and she has embarked on a number of voluntary projects and a career aimed at helping them live a better life and increase their opportunities to have fair and equal access to employment.

Born and educated in Winnipeg, Cohen, 40, says she struggled through her school years and required tutors. Her disabilities were not diagnosed until she was 28 years old. She has visual-spatial problems and difficulty dealing with abstract reasoning and in sequencing information — which means that she has difficulty with reading, writing and mathematics.

"I always knew I had a problem, but never knew what it was," she says, adding that after her problem was recognized, she began to develop strategies for coping.

For example, she began dictating into a tape recorder and transcribing and editing her material.

After moving to Toronto, she began a support group for adults, The Learning dis-Abilities Network, and a women's support group.

She went back to school and received a social service worker diploma from Centennial College in 1990 and a bachelor of social work degree from Ryerson University in 1996.

Using experience gained over 15 years of working with adolescents and adults with developmental disabilities, children and adults with autism and seniors through various home support agencies, she recently formed Sherco Consulting, working with learning disabled individuals.

"I and my associates believe that there is a lack of direct services for adults with learning disabilities and although community agencies are providing some services, we found that there wasn't ongoing expertise to help these individuals."

Cohen recently spearheaded a feasibility study in the Toronto area to examine existing services for adults with learning disabilities and to identify gaps in these services. A consumer board of people with learning disabilities was established and research consultants were hired to study numerous areas of concern, including employment-related issues.

Need for employment agency

Cohen says the preliminary results of the study indicate that there is a need for an agency which would provide employment opportunities, help people understand their learning disability, engage experts such as vocational and career counsellors and work with employers to educate them about people with learning disabilities.

She hopes that when the report is published this month, funding agencies, foundations, grants and other donations will make the needed resources available to individuals who, she says, "have been sadly neglected in the past."

Pediatric psychology award launched

TORONTO — The new Reva Gerstein Graduate Studentship in Pediatric Psychology at The Hospital for Sick Children (HSC) is the first endowed graduate student training award in pediatric psychology in Canada.

Endowed in perpetuity at the level of $500,000, the award honors Gerstein for her outstanding contribution and exemplary leadership on behalf of the children and families served by the hospital.

"I'm absolutely thrilled to receive this honor," says Gerstein. "The training program brings together two things that are very meaningful to me: psychology and The Hospital for Sick Children."

Gerstein is an HSC honorary trustee and an HSC Foundation director. Her volunteer work with the boards spans 25 years.

"I believe that this training program will reaffirm and strengthen the human aspects of ill health, embracing a broader idea of human development, one which takes into account the social aspects of our health," she says. "It feels like the continuation of work I began over 50 years ago, encompassing my growing interest in the neurological basis of coping skills."

Gerstein began her career with a PhD in developmental psychology. A recipient of the Order of Canada and the Order of Ontario, she is known for championing the rights and concerns of the vulnerable in society. She has received the National Hincks Award, and was appointed to the Premier's Health Strategy Council, where she chaired the committee on healthy public policies. She founded the Gerstein Crisis Centre for Psychiatric Patients in Toronto in 1988.

The announcement was made on Gerstein's birthday.

"Through this training award, Sick Kids will be able to attract the top graduate students into priority areas of the hospital, consistent with the hospital's mission," says Dr. Brian Shaw, director of psychology. "Most importantly, it will enable these students to work with the top pediatric psychology team in North America."

CD's upbeat music has political message

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Marcia Beck and Friends Lisa recently launched their first CD with a concert that garnered cheers and encores from over 150 people at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

"There was so much warmth from the audience it felt like we were playing at a party," Beck said. "This was a big moment for us and it was wonderful to share with this audience. They were incredibly supportive."

The release of the CD, Another Live Show, was the "culmination of years of work," said singer/songwriter Beck, who's also a social worker.

In deed, Beck, 27, who has been singing semi-professionally since she was a teenager, began writing songs when she was seven years old, she said, noting that at the age of eight, she formed her first group with three other girls.

Beck put her current group together in 1994, but her friendship with the two Lisas (Lisa Barnoff and Lisa Goodman) dates back to her school days. Their instrumentals are limited to acoustic guitar and simple percussion instruments like the bongo drum.

The group performed a musically versatile selection of songs written and arranged by Beck at the concert, opening with Generations of Children, a song from the CD. Like most songs Beck writes, Generations has a strong social political message: Many people talk the talk about changing the world, but few are prepared to risk what they have to walk the walk of change. The music is up-beat and playful, with the vocal arrangements somewhat reminiscent of the mid-'60s pop style.

When You Understand Me, the second song of the first set and the opening song on the CD, beckons people to work harder to achieve greater harmony and understanding with one another. As in the CD, this arrangement featured prominent percussion, giving the piece a slight Middle Eastern flavor.

Beck textures the vocals by throwing her voice into falsetto à la Joni Mitchell. Beck said Mitchell's music has been a major influence on her own work.

Rise from Slumber, Beck's favorite song on the CD, is a "call to action. We can support each other in our struggle for social justice."

Slumber's slow, lyrical melody showcases the a cappella quality of the trio's impeccable three-part harmony.

Marcia Beck

Beck grew up in North York where she studied piano and voice. In her mid-teens she did the musical arrangements for Silver Lining, a female a cappella group.

At McGill University, where she studied communications, Beck took up the guitar, continued writing songs and performed regularly at a Montreal coffee house.

After finishing her masters in social work at the University of Toronto, she travelled to Israel and spent six months on a kibbutz. During her stay, she played at a folk festival near Jerusalem. Festival organizers subsequently featured her at folk music venues across the country.

Performing in Israel gave Beck the confidence to launch her singing career when she returned to Canada in 1993, she said. "I saw it was something I could really do seriously. It was something people would really appreciate."

Beck divides her time between a private practice in feminist counselling and her singing career. She has no plans to abandon social work, she said, because she feels helping people in need is a way she "can make a difference in this world.

"I like to think I'm spending half my time listening and half my time singing."

Marcia Beck and Friends Lisa will be appearing at the Free Times Cafe at 320 College St. May 14 at 8:30 p.m.

LOST JEWISH MASTERPIECE FOUND

Stashed inside a book when its Jewish owner fled Nazi Germany in 1939, a painting by Moritz Oppenheim, the first major Jewish artist of modern times, was recently rediscovered by the owner's widow in Tel Aviv.

Unsure of its value, the widow took the 20-by-30-centimetre, oil-on-canvas portrait of a rabbinical-looking man to Sotheby's for appraisal.

"Every time I looked at it, it reminded me more and more of the work of 19th century artist Moritz Oppenheim, but so few works by Oppenheim survived the Holocaust I hardly dared to believe that this could be one of them," said David Breuer-Weil, an appraiser at the famed auction house.

"The painting was covered with a very dirty old varnish, so after gentle cleaning, I examined the painting under magnification and was amazed to find in the bottom right hand corner the monogram signature which Oppenheim frequently used."

Moritz Oppenheim (1800-82) was born in the ghetto town of Hanau near Frankfurt and, assisted by the Rothschilds and other aristocrats, turned to painting scenes of Jewish family life in his later years.

The rediscovered canvas was expected to fetch as much as $60,000 at a recent auction in Tel Aviv.

A TIME FOR REMEMBRANCE

"Even unto them will I give in My house/ And within My walls a monument and a memorial / Better than sons and daughters; / I will give them an everlasting memorial/ That shall not be cut off."

— Isaiah 56:5

Groping through the blackness, one sees nothing but countless yellow dots of light, arrayed like an eerie city, silent and nameless in the dark.

These luminous pinpoints represent the more than one million children who perished in the Holocaust.

It is, of course, done with mirrors. In actuality, even though the eye takes in many thousands of flickering dots stretching to an illusory horizon, only four candles illuminate the simple yet powerful Children's Memorial at Yad Vashem.

Israel's famous museum of the Holocaust is not a pleasant place to visit but, for anyone seriously attempting to understand the modern Jewish psyche, it is an essential place to visit.

Since it was founded on Jerusalem's Mount Herzl in 1953, Yad Vashem has grown into a sombre complex of such sprawling proportion that the hill is now known as Har HaZikaron, the Mount of Remembrance.

Upon arrival, one walks along the Avenue of the Righteous Among the Nations to the complex's centrepiece, a Historical Museum that presents the Holocaust chronologically through photographs, artifacts, documents and audio-visual aids.

The Israeli government still routinely arranges escorted private tours through this section for visiting heads of state and other VIPs, who usually emerge ashen-faced but far more aware of this definitive tragedy of Jewish history.

Archivists in Yad Vashem's Hall of Names are working to computerize the collected names and biographies of millions of martyrs, even as they continue their quest to obtain "Pages of Testimony" for all of the Six Million.

As part of its master plan, the institution is amassing newly available Holocaust-related documents from Eastern Europe and gathering videotaped eyewitness testimony in cooperation with Steven Spielberg's Visual History Foundation. A new archives building is under construction to house the new material along with some 45 million pages of documents already in Yad Vashem's possession.

Communities as well as people were destroyed by the Nazis, and the massive 2½-acre monument known as the Valley of the Communities memorializes thousands of them. Enroute to this stone-filled valley, which is a good 20-minute walk from the main building, one passes memorials to the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, to the Deportees, and various other pieces of sculpture.

Last fall, a contingent of Canadians proudly laid the cornerstone on the International Centre's new Canadian Wing.

Yad Vashem's name means "a monument and a memorial," and comes from the above passage from Isaiah. It is closed Saturdays and all Jewish holidays. Admission is free. Allow anywhere from 90 minutes to half a day for a visit. 02-751-611.

Jerusalem City Guide: One of the most informative and cleanly written guidebooks to the Jewish state is Lonely Planet's Israel, which has served me well on my last two trips. A new release by Lonely Planet, the Jerusalem city guide (276 pages, $18.50) is equally informative on its more specific subject, and has the added benefit of being pocket-sized.

Any visitor who sets out by foot through the Old City, the New City or even East Jerusalem will appreciate the cleanly-drawn, detailed maps as well as the sensible traveller's advice for which Lonely Planet writers are renowned.

Careful readers may find a few bloopers in this first edition, such as two references to Canada's "acclaimed novelist Mordechai Richlieu."

Also, the book seems to mock Israel's so-called "ultra-Orthodox" minority.

Albeit subtle, the condescension is immature and unnecessary.

Counterbalancing these flaws, however, is much fresh information about little-known but worthy sites of interest, walking tours and panoramic viewing points.

Canadian sun-seekers find pleasure in Cuban hospitality

By JOSEPH SERGE
Travel Editor

VARADERO — Cuba is fast becoming one of the most popular of holiday destinations. In fact, in 1996, one million visitors from around the world vacationed in Cuba, 150,000 of whom were from Canada.

"Nowadays people are not only seeking palm trees, beaches and sun," Juan Jose Vega, president of Cubanacan, Cuba's largest tourism company, said in Havana recently.

"Cuba, the largest island in the Caribbean has a lot more to offer besides its many kilometres of beaches. There are geographic areas to be explored and Cuban culture and history are much more developed than in other Caribbean destinations. Unlike many of the other sun destinations, Cuba is less exploited and cares for the environment.

"Another advantage Cuba has is that we entered the tourism market relatively late and have benefitted from the experience and errors of other places."

Varadero is the most popular resort for most Canadians and there are many hotels along the 20-kilometre strip. Few of the hotels are taller than three storeys. Two of the newest and nicest hotels by far are the Brisas Del Caribe with 263 rooms and the Cubanacan Gran Hotel with 331 rooms, all offering views of the ocean.

Another hotel of note in Varadero is the German-managed Tuxpan. A lot of the hotels in Cuba are managed and/or part owned by foreign companies. By Cuban law, however, no foreign company may own more than 50 percent of any hotel. The Tuxpan is home to one of the most popular nightclubs in Varadero — La Bamba. Open till early in the morning, this is a wonderful place to meet people from all over the world. And for those who miss the taste of home, it even sells Labatts. The Tuxpan has recently introduced a nightly Tropicana show. Although less flamboyant than the popular one in Havana, it is just as entertaining and it's free for guests.

For someone looking for someplace more attractive and more peaceful, perhaps for a honeymoon, Santa Lucia in the Camiguey province east of Varadero is perfect. Less of a party town, I found Santa Lucia quite exotic, a perfect place to get away from it all. The sand is powdery white and shell collectors will have a field day.

There are fewer hotels on this 18-kilometre stretch of beach, the most attractive being the all-inclusive Golden Tulip Club Caracol, a Dutch-managed chain. Its 150 rooms are contained in a snail-shell-like design of split-level condos.

The compound is somewhat poorly lit, however, and finding your room at three in the morning after one too many rum punches could be an experience. Trust me, leave the light on in your room; it will be easier to find.

Off shore, Santa Lucia is home to the second largest coral reef in the world. A wonderful place for snorkeling or diving.

Another popular resort, famous for its white beaches is Guardalavaca in Holguin. Guardalavaca is home to the Canadian-co-managed five-star hotel Delta Las Brisas. This 230-room all-inclusive resort has everything — sun, sparkling beach, fun, sand, water-sports, horseback riding and night life. And like any Cuban hotel, a pleasant and helpful staff.

One of the highlights of my recent trip to Cuba was the dolphin aquarium, 15 minutes away from the hotel. Swim in a salt-water pool and feel the surreal experience of having up to six dolphins swim up to you.

Further south, east of Santiago de Cuba, lie the Sierra Maestras, a beautiful panoramic stretch of mountains and lush, green forest where Fidel Castro started the Revolution. A trip up to the top of the Gran Piedra (Great Rock), 1,000 metres above sea level is worth the 400-stair journey. Up at the top you can take in all the sights of the sea and forest and listen to the gush of a nearby waterfall and the sounds of chirping birds and other wildlife. A very spiritual experience.

La Gran Piedra is an excellent ecotour destination for hikers, climbers, nature lovers or travellers really looking to get away from it all. The Gran Piedra houses 22 separate cottage-like cabanas and restaurants. It's like Muskoka without all the bugs.

The Cubans, generally, are free-spirited, very hospitable, easy-going and love to talk. From the old, toothless woman in Havana who wanted to know where we were from; to the taxi driver in Santiago who told us all about his boxing days in New York in the late '40s; to Hernandes our bus driver who,standing atop the Gran Piedra told us his life story and how the Revolution affected his family; to the university student at an auto museum who called himself Picasso and drew caricatures of us all (for free); to Lilly our tour guide, who frankly explained to us sexuality in Cuba — "There are approximately seven women for every man in Cuba because of the war in Angola [Cuba's Vietnam]," she explained. "So it's not unusual for a married man to have mistresses in every province."

"We have gone through very difficult years, especially after 1989," Vega admitted. "Tourism is a substantial source of labor. Most importantly the tourism industry and its continued development have contributed to major economic activities such as agriculture, transportation, construction, airports, infrastructure."

Joseph Serge was in Cuba recently as a guest of Cubanacan.

WATKIN-AGASI-FEIG

Orly left us three years ago.
Her sister Tali, mother Gail, grandparents Max & Rose and aunts Pearl and Edyie send these messages to her.

TO MY DEAR SWEET ORLY,

Three years have passed
but not one day goes by,
That I don't think of you and see your smile.

Your shining eyes I see and your laughter I hear,
I can't get you out of my thoughts,
in my heart you are so dear.

I love you, dear Orly
You are with me day and night
Forever my sister,
Forever "my light"

Love, Tali

ORLY

Your smile lifted the spirit of the meanest soul,
the hardest heart.
Your shining eyes filled with life,
Your voice filled with laughter and excitement
Affected even the saddest soul,
Your love of people,
Your insight, your charm
You left us,
But you are not gone.

Israel comes oh-so-close to hockey medal round

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's national senior team came within one goal of advancing to the medal round of an International Ice Hockey Federation Pool D tournament recently in the tiny mountain nation of Andorra.

Playing in a rink set high in the Pyrenees Mountains between Spain and France, Israel opened the tournament with a heartbreaking 4-3 loss to Yugoslavia. That, followed by a loss to Spain in a penalty-filled second game, spelled doom for the Israelis, whose 2-3 record was good for fifth place in the eight-country event. The top four teams, Croatia, South Korea, Spain and Yugoslavia will advance to Pool C next year. Israel, Australia, Bulgaria and Belgium remain in Pool D.

Game one for the Israelis proved their undoing as they fell behind 3-0 to Yugoslavia after the first period. The boys in blue battled back to tie the game, but with only three minutes left to play, Yugoslavia got a "cheap goal" off a face-off and went ahead to stay.

Torontonian Larry Bloch, 36, was one of seven skaters who joined the team from Canada. Bloch painted a glowing picture of his experience representing Israel in an international event, but was also disappointed the Israelis didn't fare better. Camaraderie on the team was good — not always the case on the national team — and expectations for a shot at a medal were high, Bloch said.

In addition, there were no racist incidents to mar the tournament, unlike the experience of the Israeli juniors in two international events earlier in the winter. The under-20 team faced anti-Semitic insults from the Yugoslav team at a tourney in Sofia, Bulgaria in December, while anti-Israel emotions among spectators ran high at an under-18 event in Belgrade, Yugoslavia later in the season.

There was nothing to compare with that in Andorra and even the Yugoslavia-Croatia matchup, which might have been expected to be fractious, did not have any untoward incidents, Bloch said.

Unlike most previous tournaments, Israel enjoyed an eight-day training camp prior to the opening faceoff and was was relatively well prepared going in.

Nevertheless, the first game for Israel was the killer, with Yugoslavia scoring all three first period goals on the power play. The refereeing was "terrible," though typical. "If you looked like you were going to do anything, you'd get a penalty," Bloch said.

Paul Rosen, who served as the team's trainer, said Russian-born goalie Evgeny Gusin was outstanding throughout the tournament though two of the goals he let in against the Yugoslavs were stoppable. Gusin arrived in Andorra only hours before the game and was "dead tired," Rosen noted.

Like game one, game two was a loss for Israel aided and abetted by questionable refereeing, Rosen and Bloch said.

The German ref assessed Israel 62 minutes in penalties in the game, not including three misconducts.

Israel's national senior hockey team finished fifth at a tournament in Andorra recently.

Only one-third were warranted, Rosen said. "He was the most brutal ref in the tournament," he added.

Israel's best defenceman, sabra skater Ran Oz, spent 17 minutes in the sin bin and "great shoulder hits were called elbowing. I'm positive the refs were intimidated by the fans," Rosen said, pointing out that despite security in the rink, "the ref still has to walk to his hotel at night."

Bloch said the Spaniards were beatable, but the penalties "get you frustrated. We couldn't control our emotions. The ref took it all away from us.

"I feel we could have beaten Spain in five on five hockey," Bloch added. The record books, however, show Spain winning 7-3.

Game three against Bulgaria was fairly even, but Israel was powered by a two-goal, two-assist performance by Sergei Zak, a Russian-born skater who played Tier II junior hockey in Kindersley, Sask., this past season.

With four minutes left in the game and the score tied 2-2, Bulgaria scored a shorthanded goal to go ahead. Instead of panicking, Israel got the equalizer 15 seconds later on the same powerplay. A minute later, Genya Feldman, captain of the Shelbourne Wolves of the OHA, got the winner in a 4-3 squeaker.

That effort against Bulgaria was Israel's best of the tournament, Rosen said. "We played with discipline, no penalties and we moved the puck nicely. We played as a team. If we played like that throughout, we could have won the silver."

Game four was a cross-over matchup with Belgium for fifth place. Israel played a disciplined, intense game and only great goaltending by the Belgian netminder kept the score 5-3 for Israel.

Game five was meaningless in terms of the final standings and Israel gave their backups a lot of ice time. They lost to Australia, allowing them to finish sixth and avoid the need to requalify.

Zak was named the tournament's all-star forward and led all scorers with 10 points (five goals and five assists).

The line of Zak, Feldman and Dan Mizrahi finished first, third and fifth in scoring, making them arguably the best unit in the tournament.

The team's coach, Nicolai Epstein, is legendary in Russian hockey circles, having coached one of the Soviet Union's greatest players, Alexander Yakushev, as a junior. But at 78, he seemed a little slow to adapt to fast-changing events on the ice, Bloch and Rosen said.

In addition to Bloch, Zak, Feldman and Mizrahi, other Israelis who joined the team from Canada included: Sergei Gudzik, Ronnie Orgil and Miron Schacham. Nick Wolfson, an orthopedic surgeon at York Central Hospital, served as the team doctor.

Women hoopsters going to Maccabiah

TORONTO — For the first time ever, Canada will send a women's basketball team to the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Organizers of the team are beating the bushes for talent and have scheduled a national tryout over two days in Toronto. Day one of tryouts will be Saturday, May 10, from 9:00 p.m. to 11:00 p.m while the second day of tryouts will take place on Sunday May 11 from noon to 3:00 p.m. Tryouts will be held at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, 4588 Bathurst Street, in Toronto (between Sheppard and Finch).

A $35 non-refundable registration fee that includes a four-year Maccabi membership will be charged.

Those interested in participating should contact one of the following Maccabi Canada officials: Sy Herling, chair of women's basketball, 905-731-0442 or 416-505-9962; Bernie Offstein, national executive secretary, 416-973-3606; or Gord Garshowitz, Ontario sports chair, 905-731-8337 or 905-479-2787.

The Maccabiah Games, held every four years and known as "the Jewish Olympics," will take place in Israel in July.

Grandmother's paintings inspire author's 300-year family tree

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — It was the childhood memory of a pair of oil paintings of her great-grandparents that prompted Elizabeth Strauss Plaut to begin the extended family-tree project that culminated, after nearly three decades of research, in the recent publication of her book-length study The Guggenheim/Wormser Family: A Genealogical 300-Year Memoir (Ktav Publishing, 1996).

Upon recollecting the 1860s-era paintings, which once hung in her grandmother's home, the Toronto rebbetzin began to ask questions about her mother's grandparents, Therese Pappenheimer Dreyfus and Samuel Dreyfus. That was about 1970.

"The more I investigated, the more intrigued I was by it," Plaut said. "As my mother used to say, 'You've got to be careful because one thing leads to another.' I think she meant it in a different way, but I found out that it was true."

One of many mysteries she had to solve concerned her grandmother's birthplace, a difficulty made more complex because her mother and various family members all gave differing place names. On this particular question, the final arbiter was her grandmother's tombstone in Cincinnati, Ohio, the Hebrew inscription of which identified the deceased's birthplace as Aldingen, a village in southwestern Germany.

As Plaut learned from an elderly relative, "If you passed through Aldingen in a carriage, by the time you turned around to look back, you were already out of town."

Given the town's small size, Plaut was thrilled and astonished to find that an Israeli library held a thin volume on Aldingen, printed about 1800. The book proved to be a goldmine, since it listed the inhabitants in family groupings and gave birthdates and other information. She also found a trove of historic material dating from the 18th century.

Over time, utilizing dozens of documentary and living sources, she carefully assembled a family chronology, determining that her earliest ancestor to live in Aldingen was Isaac Samuel Guggenheim, who came there from Worms in 1733 or 1734 when he was 30 years old.

"Because he was from Worms, he became known as 'der Wormser,' and eventually Wormser replaced Guggenheim as the family surname," she explained.

Plaut has traced her ancestry back to 1551. Since the book also includes her grandchildren, it can be said to encompass 13 generations.

The public is invited to a book launch on May 7, 8 p.m. in the Max Enkin boardroom of Holy Blossom Temple, 1750 Bathurst St.

Feminist magazine debuts in Canada

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Jewish feminist magazine Bridges marked its official debut in Canada with readings and live music by some local contributors.

The U.S.-based literary magazine recently held its Canadian launch at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (Bloor JCC), where it was sponsored by the centre's Books and Bagels program.

Shauna Richler-Lancit, Reena Mitchell Katz, Natalie Stephens, and Lillian Nattel read from their work and there was an exhibit by Yaya Padawer, a Toronto ceramic artist featured in Bridges.

The launch was organized by Shlomit Segal, Bridges' only Canadian editor. The Toronto writer/editor and a York University student, joined Bridges' editorial board four years ago.

The magazine was founded seven years ago by a group of women associated with the New Jewish Agenda, a progressive group based in New York, Segal said.

She noted that Bridges counts Adrienne Rich and Irena Klepfisz, two prominent American poets, among its regular contributors, and it is also a forum for many emerging writers.

What distinguishes Bridges from other feminist Jewish publications is that it has not "shied away from controversial issues," Segal said.

"Bridges has been a place where Jewish feminists and their friends have had an opportunity to dialogue on different issues: politics, culture, identity."

In Toronto the book is available at the Women's Book Store, 73 Harbord St.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

I'm in my 50s and I've been unemployed for almost a year. I have over 20 years of good work experience but I just can't find a job! What should I do?

Dear Reader,

The world of work today is a very different place from what it was when you entered it. There are different expectations and pressures. Even what you do to earn a living can be different from what you thought you might ever do. Former office managers are now canoe makers, former secretaries are coordinating homemaking services for the elderly.

To help you understand today's workplace and how you can profit in it, read Career Intelligence: Mastering the New Work of Personal Realities by Dr. Barbara Moses. This book breathes with the voices of many people who once used to be in your shoes and are now working.

A consultant, Moses teaches us important lessons. One of the most basic lessons is that we are responsible for managing our own careers and those of our children. If we progress in our attitudes towards earning a living and managing our money, we can teach our kids the same skills, lessons that will prove useful because no one really knows what the world of work will be like for them.

"We need to frame our experience in terms of the skills that buyers of these skills are looking for," Moses stresses.

"People in their 20s are comfortable marketing themselves but can't find the jobs. People in their 30s and 40s find it distasteful to turn themselves into a commodity. People in their 50s believe if they do good work, others will know about them," and therefore self-marketing is unnecessary, she says.

"The first step for these people is to reappraise what it means to sell themselves – it's not obnoxious self-promoting. It means developing mutually helpful, potentially economically rewarding relationships."

Developing these relationships is known as networking. The people we contact for job opportunities are the same ones we called at other times of need. We might think we're using these people or they might think we're using them.

"The trick," Moses says, "is to know when networking ends and using people begins."

In her book, she suggests how to network and not make people feel like they're being used.

Moses' book teaches 12 basic rules that should be followed to almost guarantee success, including keeping yourself marketable. It is a very useful book to have.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

Swiss Jews face ghosts of WWII

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BASEL, Switzerland — The ghosts of World War II are haunting the 18,000 Jews of Switzerland.

A a result of the trans-Atlantic debate over Switzerland's ambivalent role as a neutral power during the war, the Swiss Jewish community is facing the most serious wave of open anti-Semitism in five decades.

"Jews feel exposed, definitely," said Daniel Rothschild, vice-president of the community in Basel, the locale of the first Zionist congress a century ago. "For years, we lived quietly and discreetly, and being Jewish was never an issue. But now it is."

Switzerland, a nation of breathtaking beauty, has been accused of immorally profiting from the war by trafficking in looted Nazi gold bullion, by selling Nazi Germany military equipment and by pocketing money deposited in Swiss bank accounts by Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

These charges, which were essentially reiterated in a U.S. government report released last week by Stuart Eizenstat, have tarnished Switzerland's reputation for integrity. And while these accusations have generated a great deal of soul-searching and efforts by banks and parliament to make amends, they have also unleashed xenophobia and latent anti-Semitism.

STICKS AND STONES BUILDING HOMES

Women carry their children and their building supplies past a partially rebuilt wooden home last week at Yitzhar on the West Bank, where other settlers are working to rebuild the structure demolished by Israeli police. Police had ordered the "homes" torn down because they had been built without permits.

War crimes case opens

TORONTO — Did Wasily (Wasil) Bogutin, a Nazi collaborator, participate in the shootings of Jews and other enemies of the German Reich, or was he the son of a Jewish father who tried to ride out a turbulent period of history by working for the Ukrainian police in obscure jobs?

Those were the competing versions of Bogutin's wartime past that were placed before federal court judge William McKeown on Monday, as Bogutin's denaturalization case got under way.

In opening statements, crown attorney Christopher Amerasinghe painted a picture of Bogutin as a volunteer who served as an investigator with the Selidovka police, which took

Jewish civil servants lose bid for paid holy days

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Sixteen Jewish federal civil servants have lost their bid for paid leave in order to observe Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

In a landmark decision made public recently, the Federal Court of Appeal ruled 2-1 that the national government's policy of paid time off does not discriminate against Jewish employees.

The civil servants, led by Toronto computer analyst Sheldon Richmond, had argued that receiving statutory (and Christian) holidays like Christmas and Good Friday as paid time off — but not the Jewish High Holy Days — was discriminatory.

The Jewish employees, who work for three different government departments, filed grievances with their public service union, based on a clause in their collective agreements prohibiting discrimination on the basis of religion.

The union offered several options, including use of annual leave and working extra hours to make up for observing the High Holy Days.

The workers refused the options, and an adjudicator later rejected the grievances, saying the employer had met its duty to accommodate the employees.

A subsequent application by the employees for a judicial review was rejected by a lower court, and the matter went to the Federal Court of Appeal.

The court rejected allegations of overt bias, saying that if anything, the case is one of "indirect discrimination."

Writing for the court, Justice Alice Desjardins pointed out that federal workers' collective agreements are flexible, and give employers discretion to grant leave with pay to employees of all faiths, for a variety of purposes.

The court said that if Jewish employees received the High Holy

The News in Brief

CANADA

Donate Tax Cut: Rabbi

TORONTO — A Toronto rabbi has urged his congregants to donate their Ontario tax cuts to charity.

Saying he's appalled at child poverty levels, Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld of Temple Emanu-El has asked each of the 360 families in his synagogue to donate all or part of Ontario's planned 30 percent provincial tax reductions to local charities, such as the United Way.

Extradition Said Near

OTTAWA — Canada approved the extradition of a Saudi national allegedly involved in the June 25, 1996 terrorist bombing in Dharan, Saudi Arabia that killed 19 U.S. soldiers and wounded nearly 400 others.

Both the United States and Saudi Arabia are seeking the extradition of Abd Rahim al-Sayegh, who applied for refugee status upon arriving in Canada last August.

Kofflers to be Honored

TORONTO — The National Society of Fund Raising Executives, Greater Toronto chapter, will honor Marvelle and Murray Koffler at its annual Philanthropy Awards Luncheon on May 21 at the Sheraton Hotel.

The Kofflers will be honored for their philanthropic contributions and presented with the Outstanding Philanthropist Award.

ISRAEL

Death Penalty

JERUSALEM — The Palestinian Authority (PA) plans to try Palestinians who sell land to Israelis, including land inside the Green Line, using a Jordanian law which permits the death penalty, the PA's justice minister announced last week.

Anti-Semitism Report

JERUSALEM — Violent anti-Semitic incidents dropped around the world last year, but anti-Semitic propaganda continues to proliferate, especially on the Internet, a report released this week concluded.

Major anti-Semitic attacks — including shootings, firebombs and arson — declined from 41 in 1995 to 32 last year, according to the annual Anti-Semitism Worldwide report, prepared by Dina Porat of Tel Aviv University. In 1994, the study found 72 such incidents.

The report, published on the eve of Holocaust Remembrance Day in Israel, was co-sponsored by the Anti-Defamation League and the World Jewish Congress.

Along with the drop in major attacks, the report found a drop last year in anti-Semitic vandalism.

WORLD

Rothschild Honored

NEW YORK — Toronto philanthropist Kurt Rothschild will be honored by Yeshiva University (YU) at its 66th annual commencement exercises on May 22.

Rothschild, president of the Canadian Friends of YU, will be conferred with an honorary Doctor of Humane Letters by university president Dr. Norman Lamm.

Deportation Order

NEW YORK — The U.S. Department of Justice has won a court order of deportation against a Michigan man who served as an armed Waffen SS guard at Auschwitz and Sachsenhausen concentration camps during World War II.

Chief U.S. Immigration Judge Michael Creppy found that Ferdinand Hammer, 75, participated in persecuting persons because of race, religion, national origin or political opinion.

Cemetery Vandalized

MOSCOW — Vandals destroyed 52 headstones at a Jewish cemetery in Smolensk, a city of 280,000 in western Russia.

The desecrated headstones were turned over and broken. Dozens of metal name-plates were ripped off the stones.

Report on Terrorism

WASHINGTON — Palestinian attacks against Israelis accounted for the second deadliest spate of international terrorism in 1996, the State Department reported in its annual report, Patterns of Global Terrorism.

U.S.S.R. OFFICIALS 'RUNNING SCARED' ON NIXON VISIT

Soviet authorities, "running scared," are trying to get Jewish activists out of Moscow before President Nixon arrives for summit talks, says Richard Maass, chairman of the National Conference on Soviet Jews.

He said that's why 10 young Soviet Jews, "who represent the core of the most vocal young activists desiring to emigrate from the U.S.S.R., have been called for active military service. It is clear the Soviet officials are using this military service to make sure that these men, who have requested a meeting with Nixon, will be unavailable."

CHURCH SIDESTEPS OBSERVER CRITICISM

The draft report of a special committee appointed to deal with charges of anti-Semitism levelled at the United Church of Canada was watered down by the church's ruling body which deleted references to the United Church Observer, its editor, and a strongly anti-Zionist article printed in March.

The article, which repeated some of the worst anti-Semitic myths and charged that Zionists are engaged in a sinister conspiracy to control the press, was mentioned in the draft statement but then taken and some changes were made.

Jewish fanaticism greatest danger: Wiesel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The biggest issue facing Jews today is Jewish fanaticism, believes Elie Wiesel.

"We should do whatever we can to disarm it. It's wrong. We need the concept of klal Yisrael today," said the New York-based philosopher in an interview last week.

Speaking later that evening to a crowd of about 1,000 people at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation on Yom Hashoah, Wiesel stressed that fanaticism is a danger to which Jews should not yield. "We need heart, kindness, generosity. We had enough problems with the outside world."

Elie Wiesel

Wiesel was here for the dedication and dramatic unveiling of the synagogue's new stained glass window, Aron Kodesh and Ner Tamid. The window, which depicts the theme From Holocaust to Redemption, is by Toronto artist Ernest Raab, like Wiesel a shtetl-born Holocaust survivor.

The keynote speech was preceded by a candlelighting ceremony honoring those who perished and fought in the Holocaust. Young synagogue members participated in a flag and Torah procession; other speakers included Alex Eisen, who spearheaded the project, and Rabbi Philip Scheim. Participation by Cantor Yehudah Rottner and the synagogue choir included the singing of K'El Maleh Rachamim and Ani Ma'amin.

Despite Wiesel's worldwide renown for humanitarianism and extensive writings on the Holocaust, the 1986 Nobel Peace laureate is almost painfully self-effacing in person. "I have written 40 books [most recently All Rivers Run to the Sea, the first volume of his memoirs], and the feeling I have is I haven't even begun," he told The CJN. "I'm not playing 'false modesty.' I mean it," he insisted softly.

Sadly, he noted that although the world has made strides in science, it hasn't done so in the fields of morality or philosophy. "We try," he said.

It's the thought of young people — those living now (from whom he receives some 100 letters a month) and those who died in the Holocaust — that motivates him to continue his work, now that he is in his late 60s. Most painful of all, he said, is the knowledge of the children (like his young sister) who suffered and were killed in the Holocaust.

"I love Jewish children. I feel so responsible for them and to them," said Wiesel, his voice imbued with a quiet intensity.

Two years ago, in Birkenau, he provoked controversy by asking God not to forgive those who killed Jewish children, a plea which he reiterated unequivocally in last week's speech.

"What great things those children could have achieved. What joy could these killers have in killing children? And often they killed them in such a brutal way that I hesitate to tell you," he said. "Forgive me, but on Yom Hashoah you should know."

His description of Nazis using babies as target practice and tearing them apart, sometimes in the presence of their mothers, prompted one mother in the audience to cover her young daughter's ears.

A professor at Boston University, Wiesel wants to share his passion for learning with today's youth.

"For me the teachers I learn

Taking steps on a bridge of communal understanding

From the editor's desk

It is generally true to say that, apart from the generation of the survivors, we in the Diaspora have no experience of direct collective mourning. That is certainly true of my generation, the generation of the baby boomers.

Many of us have already been forced by bitter circumstance to recite Kaddish for the loss of one or both parents. Some of us, unfortunately, have even experienced the most sorrowful of all sorrows, namely, the loss of a child. And those of us who are the children of survivors, may even have a special insight into the inexpressible grief of our parents.

But certainly not as a society has our generation in the Diaspora experienced the terrible trauma of group suffering and collective mourning.

Herein of course, lies one of the key differences between the Jewish experience in the Diaspora and the Jewish experience in Israel.

The very ethos of Israel has been forged on the anvil of collective mourning. I do not refer here to the collective memory of Jewish history. Rather I refer to the collective mourning of a society which has never known a day of peace since its birth 49 years ago.

The IDF, comprised primarily of 18- to 21-year-olds, is the core institution of Israeli society. In a real sense, the soldiers are everyone's children. Israelis live each and every day with the possibility of attack against its young soldiers, or terror against its civilians.

Thus, collective mourning is one of the inescapably formative influences on Israel's national character.

Of course we in the Diaspora can and do empathize with and feel for our families, friends and fellow Jews in Israel But empathy, however sincere and deeply felt, is still one step removed from the actual burden of mourning the specific and direct loss of a child who died in uniform

Nowhere is the difference between the two Jewish households, namely of Israel and of the Diaspora, more eloquently manifest than in the observance of Yom Hazikaron.

We in the Diaspora try also to carry Israel's burden; we try to share their grief of group suffering and collective mourning. But, in truth, because the soldiers are not directly our children, because we generally travel our streets and ride our buses free of the worry of possible terrorist attack, there is an existential limit to how far our shoulders bow and our knees buckle.

Understanding this difference is akin to taking steps on a bridge that spans two distant households of one large and loving family.

It is a bridge we must all walk if we are truly to share the grief of collective mourning.

* * * * *

The Yom Hazikaron assembly in Toronto on the 4th of Iyar, was co-sponsored by the city's main Jewish organizations. But the service was, in essence, an Israeli design. As a result, in the way of most Israeli memorial services, it was a poignant, understated admixture of religious and secular, of prose and poetry, of song and silence. It was dedicated to the memory of the 18,538 men and women who have died since 1948 in defence of Israel and began with a moment of silence.

The silence gave way to the lyric of poetry and the stirring narrative of prose read or sung by youngsters, all of whom looked to be near the age of army induction in Israel

The emotional centerpiece of the assembly, however, was the address by Israeli consul-general Jehudi Kinar. Speaking first in Hebrew and then in English he encapsulated in five touching moments, the sanctity of the day.

The prose of his remarks was itself poetry. For example, he referred to the fallen as markers in the horizon of our memory. In Hebrew: tziyunim b'nofei hazikaron. To the discerning ear however, the use of tziyunim, markers was also a poignant double entendre for tziyonim, Lovers of Zion.

The heart of Kinar's remarks were devoted to the nature of conferring condolences. I shall briefly excerpt a small portion:

"Condolences cannot erase the tragedy. No one can restore to life, a son who has fallen, or a husband, or a brother or a grandson...No one can abate the sorrow or the longing

"But we can all extend a hand in warmth, in friendship, to help unburden the soul...not only during the days closest to the loss, but also in the days that follow. That is the essence of condolence."

Election airing

The "highlight" of the second week of the campaign was the Parizeau revelation.

Had the separatists won the October 1995 referendum, Parizeau revealed last week, he would have unilaterally proclaimed Quebec's independence "within days."

Most of the commentary on his admission dealt with its possible impact upon the Bloc Québécois' upcoming election prospects.

Largely overlooked by the political analysts was the damage the deception did to the integrity of the democratic process that the separatists have disingenuously claimed as being the very justification for the destruction of Canada in the first place.

For the process to have any validity whatsoever, it must be fair. To be fair it must be honest. To be honest, there must be absolutely no ruse, no trick, no duplicity perpetrated upon the voters.

And yet, as the former premier has made apparent, ruse, trick and duplicity were precisely his instruments during the referendum.

In part the separatist option appealed to the voters on the strength of Parizeau's pre-referendum agreement with Bouchard and Mario Dumont. Yet that agreement was predicated upon a period of bona fide "partnership" negotiation s with the federal government.

More damaging, however, was the fact that at the heart of the referendum question itself, was the promise of attempted negotiations with the federal government. Who knows how many people voted Yes, believing that bona fide negotiations with a view or a hope of finding some form of compromise was to be the next step?

But Parizeau had no intention of honoring the agreement with Bouchard and Dumont. He had no intention of honoring the conditions of the referendum question. Nor had he any intention of honoring his promise to the majority of the people of Quebec who would have rejected outright his indelicate approach to integrity in the democratic process.

Conversion bill not tied to investment: Patt

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Concern over Israel's conversion bill should not affect decisions by investors about whether to purchase State of Israel Bonds, the CEO of Israel Bonds' international office said last week.

Projects supported by Bonds are apolitical in nature and go to support the country in its entirety, said Gideon Patt. "Bonds doesn't give money to any group in particular. It gives money to the people of Israel as a whole."

Patt was responding to suggestions being circulated in Reform and Conservative communities in Canada that they should use their influence to ensure that philanthropic contributions go to enhance pluralism in Israel. The suggestions came in the wake of first reading of a bill by Israel's Knesset that would deny legitimacy to Reform and Conservative conversions in Israel.

Patt said he explained to Conservative and Reform rabbis as well as lay leaders during his brief visit to Toronto that "we're not in the category of giving funds to various groups. We are in Israel in total."

Underscoring that view was placement of an ad in last week's CJN that argued support for Israel should not be contingent on issues of the day.

Patt said he believes "this particular issue won't affect the sale of bonds."

"It is uneasy and unacceptable to many of us that because of coalition reasons, the government has to give in to demands that are not in the best interests of the state of Israel and the unity of the Jewish people," Patt stated.

Gideon Patt

A former Likud MK who held a seat for 28 years, Patt said if the bill fails, "the status quo will return. The real solution is electoral reform to reduce the role of the smaller parties."

Israel Bonds go to develop the country's infrastructure through road development and improvements, laying of sewage pipes, providing telephone and telecommunications lines and the construction of schools, he said.

In the city of Eilat on the Gulf of Aqaba, for instance, Bonds was instrumental in creating a beachfront lagoon, installing a modern infrastructure and providing grants to entrepreneurs to help get the city's tourism business off the ground, he said. During his tenure as minister of Industry, Trade and Tourism in the late 1970s and early '80s, Bonds pumped $1 billion US into Eilat. The city's population grew from 7,000 in 1979 to 45,000 today. Tourist accommodation grew from 400 non-air conditioned rooms to 4,500 luxury rooms, with thousands more under construction. The city adds an estimated $600 million to Israel's economy each year.

Bonds was also a key player in developing the bedroom community of Ma'ale Adumim outside Jerusalem, helping it grow from a bare mountaintop site in 1978 to a city of 28,000 in 1996.

Bonds also played a crucial role in helping develop Israel's power grid, which generates 7,500 megawatts annually, far greater than Jordan's 450 megawatts and not far off Egypt's 9,000 megawatts, which services a population 10 times greater than Israel's.

Last year, Bonds sales totalled close to $90 million US in Canada while worldwide, Bonds' 1997 goal is $250 million US.

Patt pointed out that Bonds should not be considered a charitable gift to Israel but rather a sound financial investment. Five-year bonds, for example, currently pay 7.5 percent based on a figure 780 basis points above five-year U.S. Treasury notes. (A minimum $25,000 investment is required.)

Extolling Bonds' record, Patt noted that since they were introduced in 1952 by then Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion, they have never missed a redemption, making them a safe and reliable investment.

Despite the economic boom being experienced by Israel, Bonds remain a vital part of the country's economy, Patt continued. They continue to play a key role in civilian infrastructure development and with the relative decline in military spending, civilian portfolios like education, health, housing and absorption now receive a bigger slice of the government's budget pie.

Bonds is important in maintaining Israel's high standard of living, which is now comparable to that in Western European countries, and in serving as a launching pad for regional economic development. If Israel can help in the economic development of its Arab neighbors and help raise their standards of living, people in these countries will see a tangible benefit from peace, he added.

Branson's viability before targetted closing in question

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Grave doubts have surfaced about whether Branson Hospital can keep operating until its targeted closure in June 1999, in the face of its losing medical and other staff.

"This will leave a terrible gap in health services for this community," said Jack Gallop, the hospital's CEO and president.

The serious possibility that Branson may not be able to hang on is raised in appeals to the Hospital Restructuring Services Commission by both Branson and the North York General Hospital (NYGH) expected to get most of Branson's patients in the future.

"Our chairman has asked the commission for an early meeting, before its final report, to explore ways of keeping the hospital open," Gallop said.

Both hospital briefs say there is danger that doctors and staff at Branson will leave if they are offered other jobs. Branson has 1,050 employees and 280 physicians.

One silver lining in the dark cloud over Branson is the strong support it has received from NYGH, which in its brief to the commission, supports an ambulatory care centre at Branson instead of shutting the hospital down completely.

However, Branson favors the option of ambulatory care, with the building also being used to care for long-term patients who have no other place to go.

High rate of patient discharge

In its brief, Branson reiterates its belief that it is being penalized for its early discharge of inpatients, in that its total flow of patients through outpatient and other services is higher than that of two other hospitals, one in Scarborough and one in Etobicoke, that are not being closed.

Branson has a high rate of patient discharges because so many are being referred to home care and other services, the brief says.

It is encouraging that both NYGH and the Metro District Health Council are supporting Branson's bid to be an ambulatory care centre, Gallop said.

It would include day care surgery and be equivalent to a walk-in clinic, he said.

Emergency heart and other cases could be resuscitated and stabilized in this centre before being transferred by ambulance to another hospital.

A shuttle bus between Branson and North York General for ambulatory patients is favored by Murray Mackenzie, NYGH president. "We pick up patients now," he said.

The plight of frail, elderly patients if Branson is shut is stressed in the Branson brief.

Branson serves more Jewish patients than any other hospital in Metro, with 30,000 seniors in its area depending on its services. A "large majority" of its physicians are Jewish, the brief says.

If it closes, the area around it will be the largest in Metro Toronto without access to acute care beds.

Branson has the heaviest concentration of elderly of any community hospital in Metro.

It will cost more than the stated $43.6 million to shut Branson, and even at that figure, it will take 63 years to offset the cost with savings.

Branson serves a Metro population in which those 65 plus represent almost 20 percent of the population. Patients over 75 and over 65 account for 26 percent and 42 percent, respectively, of the discharges from Branson in 1995-96.

For those living west of Yonge Street, travel by public transit to NYGH will mean three bus rides or two bus rides and a subway ride.

"At Branson we have developed, in collaboration with Queen Elizabeth Hospital, a geriatric module, activating those patients to the point where we now return many patients to their homes who would otherwise be transferred to a long-term care facility.

"The large majority of our physicians are Jewish. In the absence of an equitable human resources plan these professionals will share a disproportionate share of the hospital restructuring burden."

Branson is the second busiest of the seven hospitals across the top of Metro, the brief states.

"We can handle the extra patients we'll get from Branson if we get the funding," said Mackenzie.

In their own appeal to the commission, NYGH said it needs $49 million in new capital funds, not the $14 million figure suggested by the commission. If an ambulatory care centre is set up at Branson, that capital figure would be cut by $6 or $7 million.

About $13 million a year more than the commission's figure would be needed for its operating budget, the NYGH brief said.

Wiesel's warning

from are still alive," he said during the interview in Rabbi Scheim's study. "I see Rabbi Akiva, literally... I open the book and I hear [his] voice; it carries me."

In his speech, Wiesel, who grew up in a chassidic environment in Sighet, Romania, bemoaned the loss of pre-war European Jewry. "There was something about Jewish life then that was so special and so unique, and woe unto us, that life, that social framework were wiped out."

The Holocaust could have been prevented, he asserted, stating several instances when other countries could have stepped in.

"What hurts so much," said Wiesel, was the inaction of "people that we admired, cherished, glorified... Little did we know that [then United States president] Franklin Delano Roosevelt knew so much and refused to do anything."

Wiesel credited the Zionist movement and the creation of Israel in 1948 for saving "so many people from giving up on Jewishness, humanity and everything else."

He implored survivors to record their experiences. "Every person who was there has a unique story. Write, write, write. We need to know. Maybe there is one sentence that will shed some kind of sombre light."

Jolting Juxtaposition

Two small Israel-related news items appeared alongside each other in the international news roundup in the Globe and Mail of May 10.

The headline on the first item was "Palestinian found dead." This, in part, was the story: "A Palestinian accused of selling Arab homes and land to Jews was found dead yesterday in Ramallah with his hands tied behind his back. An Islamic leader declared him an infidel who could not be buried in a Muslim cemetery...Palestinian justice minister Feih Abu Medein...said the incident was proof that nobody will accept a traitor."

The headline on the second story was "Israel urged to stop torture." It read, in part: "The UN Committee against Torture called on Israel yesterday to stop interrogating Palestinian detainees with methods including sleep deprivation and violent shaking, saying this constituted torture and broke international law."

The placement of these two news briefs, side by side, was a fortuitous entry point, like the dark slippery slide in Alice's wonderland, into the surrealistic world of Middle East geopolitics.

Israel is, like all countries, imperfect. Its leaders are imperfect. Their decisions are imperfect. Their behavior is imperfect. But in the main, they at least hold true to the rule of law, democracy's chief hallmark.

It is within the context of the rule of law in the first place that the Supreme Court of Israel has struggled, if imperfectly, to balance the legitimate collective needs of protecting the state and its citizens against the legitimate individual rights of Palestinian detainees suspected of terrorist actions or connections. That there even is a requirement for the state's security apparatus to seek permission to use "pressure" in interrogation is a tribute to the evolving maturity of the country's loyalty to due process.

The decision by the UN Committee against Torture to censure Israel was a throwback to the post-1967 days when the UN was marked by the tyranny of the so-called non-aligned majority. Every Arab-inspired anti-Israel resolution was backed by Soviet sponsors and was always assured of a majority by the states who were their clients, or wanted to be. The substance of those resolutions reflected very little, if any, of the truth of life in the Middle East. And yet, like bitter waters from a contaminated faucet, the resolutions flowed unabated for more than two decades, drowning all credibility in the institution, until the peace process appeared to staunch the sour stream in the early '90s. Now it appears the UN is once again being used as a canvass of the surreal. The Palestinian Authority (PA) selects the subject and Yasser Arafat holds the brush.

The juxtaposition of the news items makes this obvious.

The first item, though merely a "brief," was a trove of the anti-rule of law cultural deposits that course through the soil of Palestinian society: that the sale of property to a Jew should be punishable by death; that a seller of such property was found dead with his hands tied behind his back, obviously murdered; that a religious leader, said in effect, that the murdered person deserved the punishment as an "infidel;" and that the justice minister of the PA should fail to condemn either the vicious murder or the gleeful declaration of the Islamic leader.

The second item was also a trove, but of the irrefutable proofs that an anti-Israel voting majority can still be whipped up in the UN by the colleagues and friends of the PA that finds no fault in murdering someone who sells property to a Jew.

It was a jolting juxtaposition.

Canada's anti-terrorism actions

I am writing in regard to your recent story on Hezbollah (CJN, April 17).

The government of Canada, through its departments and agencies, is committed to combating international terrorism and to ensuring that Canada does not become a base or safe haven for terrorists operating abroad. As I noted in my statement on national security last year, we are aware that Canada, by its peaceful and democratic nature, can be attractive to terrorist organizations seeking sanctuary or funds to continue terrorism in other lands. I can assure you that we will continue to use every method allowed by law to ensure that this does not occur.

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) works closely with the Department of Citizenship and Immigration (CIC) to provide security advice on persons seeking status in Canada. Recent actions by the government of Canada ordering the deportation of persons engaged in terrorism through the process under the Immigration Act send strong messages that terrorists should not consider Canada as a safe venue, and demonstrate the effectiveness of the Immigration Act in this area.

In order to provide timely and meaningful security advice to CIC, CSIS maintains reciprocal vetting arrangements with a broad number of police and security agencies throughout the world. This helps to ensure that persons who have been engaged in terrorism abroad should not expect that they can conceal their past activities from Canadian authorities.

Canada has made strong commitments through the G7 group to combating terrorism and has reaffirmed its belief that a multilateral approach to the problem of international terrorism is the only solution. These commitments are ongoing and will no doubt be the subject of further discussion at this year's G7 leaders meeting in Denver, Colo.

In its investigation of terrorists and terrorist activities in Canada, CSIS is aware that some groups or individuals might be directed or supported by foreign powers or instruments. CSIS is mandated to investigate such activity and to report to government.

CSIS and other agencies of the government consider public safety to be their greatest priority. The government's objectives are to ensure the safety of Canadians at home and abroad from acts of terrorism and to ensure that Canada does not become a safe haven for individuals or activities supporting international terrorism.

As the questions you submitted my office also deal with matters outside of my role as solicitor general, I have forwarded them to the minister of Foreign Affairs and to the minister of Citizenship and Immigration for their consideration.

Compares Star's coverage of Holocaust and Israel

In Ron Csillag's March 27 article regarding the coverage of Israel in the Toronto Star, he indicated that the disproportionate amount of attention Israel receives in the Star is partly due to the fact that "journalists are naturally drawn to stories involving Jews ...and conflict." These points are valid today, but do not apply to the Toronto Star's coverage of the Holocaust during the war years.

I recently discovered while conducting research for a York University Holocaust course that when Jews were involved in a conflict in which they were the principal victims, the Star reported their struggles infrequently and placed Holocaust-related stories in obscure parts of the paper.

It is rather peculiar that the Star currently recognizes the magnitude of Palestinian suffering, but 50 years ago, equated the Jewish catastrophe with the difficulties faced by Poles, Russians and many other ethnic groups.

Perhaps, the Star finds the "Jewish story" much more interesting when the Jews are seen as the "empowered victimizers," not the stateless victims.

Miracle of Israel must live on

This is not the first time in history that there has been dissension among our people. However, I would like to stress that this current religious debate in Israel and the statement of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis does not and should not affect the aims and objectives of organizations that support the State of Israel. It disturbs me that any religious or political debate would turn people away from supporting the daily struggle of a Jewish homeland and its people.

As a member of the executive board of State of Israel Bonds, I wish to state that this organization has but one mission — to build and develop the State of Israel through the purchase of Israel Bonds. Like any democratic country, Israel will always have its share of controversies. Nonetheless, the independence of modern Israel and its economic strength in our lifetime is a miracle that must be sustained. We have waited too long and worked too hard for a Jewish homeland to make our support for Israel contingent on the issues of the day.

Perspectives

"A horrid and wretched spectacle"

Five hundred years ago, on pain of death, the Jews of Portugal were forced to undergo baptism. To avoid that fate, many tried to leave the country; many chose death. The CJN asked Sarah Taieb-Carlen, of York University to write about that period of Jewish history.

Part I

By SARAH TAIEB-CARLEN

Until the mid-14th century, Jews in Portugal had enjoyed the trust and protection of their rulers since the establishment of the Portuguese monarchy in 1179.

For example, in 1190, King Sancho I granted the Jew, Don Solomon Jachia, the title of field marshal general and the command of the army. King Sancho II preferred to appoint Jews rather than Christians to public offices. A chief rabbi, Arrabimor Judah, was King Dinis' high treasurer and minister of finance in 1289. On Saturday and other holidays, Jews were exempted from attending court. So, until the reign of Joao II, the history of Portugal was not sullied with the cruel and inhuman episodes which so often disgraced the history of Spain and other parts of Europe.

As the Portuguese historian Alejandro Herculano wrote: "In no other part of Europe in the Middle Ages did the ruler, by his laws or administrative decisions favor and protect the Jewish race as much as in Portugal".

However, from the mid-14th century on, the Jews became socially and legally inferior to Christian citizens. They were forced to live in the judiaria (Jewish quarter), had to wear a distinguishing patch of cloth in order to be easily identified, and were forbidden to hire Christian servants or to socialize with Christians of the opposite sex. They could not practise usury, hold any function in public administration or justice, or bear witness in a lawsuit involving Christians. The testimony of Christians against Jews was always valid, even in cases involving Jews only. The Jews had to pay heavy taxes as well as huge contributions and "gifts" to the king whenever he found himself in dire financial straits.

Until 1497, there were very few cities or villages in Portugal that did not have a Jewish comuna (community) with its own legal and administrative organization, often copied from the Christian concelho (council). The comunas were entirely governed by Jewish councilors, arrabis (rabbis) and arrabimors (chief rabbis), although in certain places and at certain periods, they had to accept as final the decision of a Christian judge. If one was unhappy with the decision of the Jewish judges, one could always appeal the king's council, which was bound to the Jewish legal system. In cases of civil suits between Christians and Jews, the court was compelled to follow the jurisdiction of the defendant.

Portuguese Jews were intellectually, religiously and culturally very similar to Spanish Jews. As early as 1485, Rabbi Eliezer and Rabbi Tzorba introduced Hebrew printing in Portugal. And from 1485 to 1494, of the first 21 books printed in Portugal, 16 were printed by Jews and 14 of those were printed in Hebrew.

Historian dos Santos wrote: "We are chiefly indebted to [the Jews] for the first knowledge of philosophy, botany, medicine, astronomy and cosmography, as well as for the rudiments of the grammar of the holy language, and nearly all the studies of biblical literature. [This] puts us in a state to enter into competition with the more advanced nations of Italy and Germany."

Furthermore, King Joao II asked Rabbi Rodrigues, Rabbi Jose and the geographer Belem "to form rules for taking the altitude of the sun, and tables of its declination, for his vassals who were making voyages on the coast of Africa."

Since medieval Portuguese society was composed mostly of soldiers, priests and farmers, the Jews played a crucial role in the economy. They excelled in external and internal trade and in tax-farming; they were superb tailors, shoemakers, goldsmiths and silversmiths; and they almost totally monopolized medicine. Moreover, members of the royal family, the nobility and the clergy entrusted them with the management of their estates and were always ready to protect them from the hostile masses who hated them for religious and economic reasons.

Despite all this goodwill and apparently efficient measures, however, the Jews did suffer. For example, in 1385, a mad crowd massacred Jews in Lisbon, Evora and Coimbra. Horrified, King Joao I demanded from his subjects "that the rights and privileges of the Israelites should be respected." But again in 1449 and in the 1480s and 1490s, Christians attacked the judiaria of Lisbon, chanting: "Let's kill them and rob them."

Fleeing the Spanish Inquisition, many conversos (crypto-Jews of Spain) found refuge in Portugal. But on April 3, 1487, Pope Innocent VIII enjoined all Christian rulers to expel the conversos from their kingdoms and to facilitate the work of the Inquisition. It took King Joao II a few years to bow to the Pope's wishes, but in March 1494, he had many convertidos (crypto-Jews of Portugal) arrested and burnt alive and he ordered all of them out of his country before the end of 1494.

However, when the Jews of Spain, expelled in 1492, asked him to let them settle in his country, he accepted with the following conditions: The 600 richest Jewish families had to pay 60,000 gold cruzados (an enormous sum); the others had to go to port cities after paying an entry tax and promising that they would not stay more than eight months (contravening one or both of these conditions would cost them their freedom as they would then be sold as slaves); artisans could pay only half the amount of the entry tax if they agreed to settle permanently in Portugal.

According to Damiao de Goas, a 16th-century Portuguese chronicler, more than 20,000 families, each counting 10, 12 or more people, settled in Portugal, thus doubling the size of the Jewish population of the country and making up to one-tenth of the total population in 1495, which, for an occidental Christian country, was an extraordinarily high proportion.

Many Jews unable to leave within eight months were given as slaves to whoever wanted them and the king had their children under 14 years of age baptized and sent to populate his new colony of Sao Tome in Africa.

Holding a Hebrew book and wearing a "Jewish hat" and a six-pointed badge, a rabbi is seen attending the patron saint of Portugal in The Veneration of Saint Vincent, by the 15th century painter Nuno Goncalves. [From Heritage, Civilization and the Jews, A. Eban, Summit Books, 1984]

In December 1495, Manoel became king of Portugal and freed the Jews who had been reduced to slavery by his predecessor. But his political ambitions soon made him very intolerant toward the Jews. He wished to marry Isabella, the eldest daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain, but Isabella and her parents put a sine-qua-non condition on this alliance: that King Manoel forcibly convert or expel from his kingdom all the Jews and Muslims. Manoel, wary of the consequences that might result from forcing the Muslims to convert, because there were many Christians living in Muslim countries, decided instead to provide them with whatever means they needed to help them leave Portugal. But he had no such fear for the Jews, and on Dec. 5, 1496, he ordered them out of his country by April 1497. Otherwise they would be put to death. He promised that they could take all their property with them, that all the money owed them by Christians would be paid before their departure and that he would provide them with adequate means of transportation.

On Dec. 31, 1496, telling the Jews he wanted to make sure they would be well treated by the captains of the ships and their sailors, the king ordered them to individually ask his permission to leave Portugal. Expecting only a very few to comply, he was surprised and disappointed when practically all the Jews asked for permission to leave. Furious, he resolved to stop at nothing to achieve his double aim: to suppress Judaism forever in Portugal but to keep the majority of his Jews, with their skills and their wealth.

In April 1497, he ordered all children up to the age of 20 to be baptized and sent to Catholic convents. Bishop Osorio, a historian of the time wrote: "It was a horrid and wretched spectacle to see tender children torn from the arms and breasts of their distressed mothers…Some were so distracted that they destroyed their children by casting them into wells. Others, in fits of despair, made away with themselves…Many became Christians. Some, perhaps were sincere…but far more were only so in outward appearance. By this means they recovered their children and were restored to their freedom."

The king then promised to return the children to their parents if they also converted and when they refused, they were thrown into jail without food or drink. Later, reneging on an earlier promise to give the Jews the choice of three ports from which to depart — Lisbon, Oporto and Setubal — he ordered them all to gather in Lisbon. Once there, they were forcibly dragged to churches to be publically baptized in front of a delirious and frenzied populace. Only a few hundred managed somehow to take advantage of the confusion and flee to Morocco.

Jews all over Portugal heard what had happened to their brothers and sisters who had trusted the king and many externally adopted the religion being forced upon them. Some preferred to kill themselves rather than submit to the will of a cruel and deceitful king. Thus ended the once peaceful and prosperous Jewish community of Portugal and thus started the painful but common story of the convertidos who would also be subjected to the horrible machinery of the Inquisition.

Opinions

An age-old pattern

The arrogance of nations is unbelievable. First, they push Israel into a corner through "repeated and biased criticism. Then, when they helped isolate Israel internationally, they blame Israel for being alone in the world."

By Emil Fackenheim in Jerusalem

Thus wrote Jan Willem van der Hoeven, the head of the Christian Embassy in Jerusalem, on April 2 in the Jerusalem Post. In Jewish history, it is an old syndrome: first they would stop Jews from anything but money-lending, they they would blame them for lusting after gold. That was medieval. In modernity Moses Mendelssohn complained that they tie our hands and then blame us for not using them.

I am glad to get this from van der Hoeven just prior to departing for Germany, for a semester as Franz Rosenzweig professor at Kassel University. True, I do not expect in West Germany what I got four years ago in my one time home town of Halle, in the former Communist East: "You are doing to the Palestinians what we did to you." That was clever stuff straight from Moscow, at once attacking Israel and trivializing the Holocaust. Still, in its pros and cons about the peace process, the Federal Republic of Germany has joined that herd of independent politicians, the Europeans, in its pro-PLO bias.

In fairness, "the nations" are probably unaware of the pattern van der Hoeven has pointed out. That is why I am glad he spoke up. Sometimes a forthright statement, made by a courageous person, breaks a pattern. Maybe next he will speak up about Arafat's charge of our "Judaizing" Jerusalem — A word loaded with prejudice for many centuries.

About color-blindness

The word "race" is used loosely these days if it is used at all. As for me, I would be happy to dispense with it altogether, for it calls attention to differences that do not exist. Still, an unhappy reality needs to be dealt with. Examples of racism mar the human landscape, and I am a living witness to its potential ferocity. I was present when our Allied troops opened the first concentration camp they came across in 1945, and what I saw then cured me for the rest of my life, if curing I ever needed.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

My religious tradition fortifies my view of "race" as a recent lamentable invention. It has always struck me that the Torah — the spiritual constitution of Judaism and Christianity and a motive power in the nascence of Islam — does not have a word for "race." It has a word for poor which occurs many times throughout the text, and in a memorable passage the Torah says that the poor will never disappear, they will always be with us.

But no such text is found about race. For someone living today, that may be hard to believe. While prejudice and discrimination did of course exist in biblical days, the Torah does not relate them to race. In the catalogue of nations in the 10th chapter of Genesis, people of the world are divided according to two characteristics: their geographic location and their language. Nothing is said about being red, black, yellow, white or whatever.

In our day, "race" denotes persons different from us; in the Bible, such people are called "strangers." Over 30 times, the text reminds us to befriend them. They deserve this treatment because they lack a support system they had back home, and not because they are different in nature or color. When strangers become residents, they are fully accepted into society.

Our language still reflects this close connection between persons who once were strangers and perhaps potential enemies, and the friends and members of society that they will hopefully become. Take the Latin word for "enemy" which is hostes. (The English word "hostility" comes from it.) But when instead of fighting the hostes you take him in and become his host, the stranger who yesterday posed a threat has become a partner and friend. The potential enemy, the hostes, is taken in by the host as into a hostel, and therefore through the practice of hospitality the tensions are dissolved.

What this all amounts to can be stated very simply: my tradition has nothing to say about race, and while it is asserts that poverty will always be with us, it does not say that racism will also be. Therefore, the challenge of this day, which is to eliminate racism all over the world, appears to me something that is achievable.

I understand the Torah to say to me: "You were born color-blind," metaphorically speaking. Dr. Oliver Sacks, in his latest book, speaks about the disability of color-blindness, taking it in the physiological sense. In the metaphoric sense, color-blindness is an ideal that society must achieve if it is to be healthy at the core.

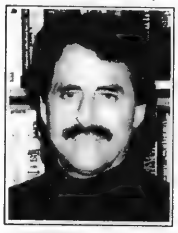
Wishing better life for next generation

I must admit that even for a cynical journalist like me, this year's Holocaust Day was especially difficult to witness and experience. The reason lies mostly in the fact that I am a parent and not just a journalist.



By Martin Himel in Herzliya

This year's Holocaust day was dedicated to the 1.5 million Jewish children murdered by the Nazis, and to the 350,000 other youths who survived but have yet to escape their terrifying past. We have all seen the heart-wrenching celluloid black and white images of dead and dying children in the Warsaw Ghetto.

But it was actually watching my 11-year-old daughter Sasha standing among her Grade 5 class at Brandeis Public School, each wearing the yellow star on their clothes with "Jude" imprinted on it that struck home.

For a few moments, I could imagine how I would feel if my daughter was transported back in time and place to Nazi-occupied Europe. For a few seconds I could sense the terror, the hopelessness, the frustration of not being able to protect her from harm. For several precious minutes I could feel the horror of her loving family shelter burned away in the ovens of Auschwitz and Treblinka.

In one instant protected, in another destroyed, or maybe even worse, suddenly left alone to survive in a hostile world where a Jewish child is denied the right to live. No wonder, I thought, that a nation built out of the Holocaust would be so mistrusting of other countries, so obsessed with protection and survival, and would view Arab regimes as the next reincarnation of the Nazi threat.

I can understand the fear, I can understand the threat, I can understand the need to be able to defend yourself and your family. But while I can empathize, I cannot accept the often accepted conclusion that it is better to live by the gun, surrounded by enmity, and not risk compromise with Arab neighbors lest there be another Holocaust.

Such a conclusion only condemns us to living in a self-imposed Warsaw Ghetto with self-fulfilling prophecies of pan-Arab hostility for Jews being realized.

We have to remember the Holocaust, we must never forget, but we must also not be chained by our difficult past.

I am not saying there is no need to be vigilant or not to be strong. Israel is a nuclear power and it is a good thing the Jewish state has such deterrence in such a rough environment as the Middle East.

But it is precisely that strength that can give Israel the luxury of being able to compromise over territory and still be secure. Such compromise will not magically create love between Arab and Jew. Deep down inside, Arabs definitely want to throw "Jews into the sea," and to be quite honest, most Israelis — even those on the left — want the Palestinians to evaporate like water in the Negev.

But their wanting to throw us into the sea does not mean it can be done. Our Holocaust legacy should not convince us that genocidal desire and capability are one and the same. Rather, the six million should teach us to be vigilant, yet searching for a change based on more positive human values.

While Palestinians and Israelis are bonded by mutual hate, there is also a common bond in the wish for a better life for the next generation of Jewish and Arab children, a life that would be so much better than the terrible fate met by the children of the Holocaust. That desire should be cultivated in a renewed and vigorous peace process.

National unity the key issue for Quebec Jews

By HAROLD M. WALLER

Opinion

As this election campaign unfolds, the Jews of Montreal, like many of their fellow citizens in other parts of Canada, know what their political objectives are, but they are not necessarily sure how to pursue them.

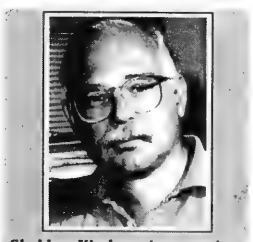
The campaign, which is already nearly a third of the way to completion at this writing, has so far failed to shed light on the vital issues, much less provide voters with a clear indication of what difference their choice will make.

In a sense, this is a surreal election: the country faces one overriding issue, yet there is little talk about how to deal with it. It is almost a case of prospective governing parties hoping that if they form a government, the problem will somehow or other go away, allowing them to devote themselves to the more mundane but less challenging tasks of governing.

Of course, one can ask whether in fact there is more than one prospective governing party. If not, do the Liberals not have a special obligation to make their plans eminently clear to an electorate that is so fragmented that it is difficult for a coherent opposition to present itself?

The key issue, of course, is national unity, a euphemism for the more complex issue of what the federal government plans to do to maintain the integrity of the federation in the face of a governing movement in Quebec that persists in threatening secession and by the admission of its former leader that he came close to carrying out insurrectionary moves in 1995. This is the central and fundamental issue for Montreal's Jews and for most Quebec federalists of any background.

Is national unity more important for Jews than for other federalists? That is an interesting question. Montreal's Jews have been especially sensitive to the possible excesses of Quebec nationalism over the years. It is no secret that many Jews have been particularly outspoken on the issues over the years. (One recalls Charles Bronfman's remarks in 1976.) More recently, Jews have been very prominent in a number of grassroots unity organizations, some of which stress the partition of Quebec into federalist and separatist areas should the province attempt to secede from Canada. Needless to say, Mordecai Richler's no-holds-barred writing style has become a prominent feature of anti-separatist sentiment in Montreal.



Sheldon Kirshner is on assignment in Switzerland. The Kirshner File will be re-opened upon his return.

It is difficult to know with certainty, but the sensitivity of the Jews probably reflects the historical experience of the Jewish people, which has not been comfortable in extreme nationalist environments where Jews were among those perceived as outsiders.

For all of the efforts of the Jewish community to integrate into Quebec life, both individually and as a community, the vast majority of Jews here simply do not share those feelings and emotions that fuel the separatist impulse among so many Québécois.

The combination of widespread Jewish opposition to the independence project and the prominence of Jews in various anti-separatist or pro-Canada organizations has created an atmosphere where Jews can easily become the targets of nationalist anger and resentment.

Thus, even though Jews are not oppposed to secession simply because they are Jews, they often feel singled out by the various outbursts of the more radical separatists. And then-premier Jacques Parizeau's denunciation of "money and the ethnic vote" was perceived as a thinly veiled threat by many Jews.

If Jews in Montreal were asked what they wanted, most would probably prefer an end to the separatist threat that has been a source of constant anguish for over 20 years. The next best thing would be assurance that the federal government would deal decisively with that danger when the crunch came. There is a widespread perception that the federal government was not prepared adequately for a possible Yes majority in the 1995 referendum. Can the parties now tell us how they will handle such an eventuality in the future?

For the Jews, these issues will be played out most vividly in the campaign in Mount Royal riding, which covers the Town of Mount Royal, Cote St-Luc, Hampstead, and parts of Montreal. It is a heavily Jewish riding that traditionally votes Liberal and can be counted upon to provide a nearly unanimous No vote in any referendum on independence. Currently the riding is represented by former cabinet member Sheila Finestone. Her two main challengers are Carolyn Steinman for the Progressive Conservatives and Howard Galganov, an independent. All three of these candidates are well known within the community. Finestone has had a high profile during her many years as an MP, Steinman runs the busy Montreal office of Canadian Friends of Hebrew University and is the only one of the three who lives in the riding, and Galganov has made headlines since 1995 with his various populist campaigns for English-language rights.

For the residents of Mount Royal, the question will be whether the Liberals' record on national unity during the Chrétien era inspires confidence that they will be able to handle a future crisis. If so, then the voters will do their usual thing and vote for Finestone. If they prefer to protest what they consider to have been weak leadership in Ottawa and a willingness to contemplate sacrificing their rights and interests in order to placate Quebec nationalists, then they might choose Galganov, thereby providing him with a platform in the House of Commons to articulate a more confrontationist and less accommodating position on their behalf. A more conventional way to express discontent with the Liberals would be to send Steinman to Ottawa, especially if her leader appears to be doing well in other parts of Quebec.

There are other issues in this campaign too, notably the economy, which has yet to produce the job growth that the country needs so badly; the high levels of taxation; the effects of sharp cuts in government spending.

For Jews, the question of Nazi war criminals in Canada continues to rankle. It is over a half century since the end of the Holocaust. During most of that time the Liberals have held power. Yet Canada's record of dealing with accused war criminals is an embarrassment. Will a new Liberal government do better than its predecessors? Would any of the other parties do any better?

These are trying times in Montreal. Minority communities, including Jews and others, experience unrelenting pressure from the threat posed by the PQ's control of the provincial government. The combination of antagonistic policies on a day to day basis with the prospect of another referendum makes those voters weary and frustrated. They are looking to the federal parties to point to a way out of this conundrum but finding little that would reassure them. This is not a time for politics as usual, certainly not in the city in which Canada has to prove that the country works.

Great leaders become great because they respond in creative ways to the demands imposed by crises. The voters are justified in asking where they can find Canada's great leader.

Montreal riding ethnically diverse

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Outremont Liberal incumbent Martin Cauchon eased to an easy, 4,400-vote victory over the Bloc Québécois (BC) in the ethnically-diverse, usually safe Liberal seat in 1993.

But BQ candidate Michel Sarra-Bournet feels Cauchon will have his work cut out for him this year.

The riding, whose western boundary is Victoria Street in Snowdon, has been redrawn and now stretches eastward into Montreal's "Plateau" region all the way to St. Hubert Street.

That means while the riding still includes a significant number of Jews — by rough estimate about 3,500, including most of Montreal's ultra-Orthodox population and Jewish pockets in Snowdon and Cote des Neiges — it will also for the first time include potentially stronger nationalist support.

The other contenders for the seat include Progressive Conservative (PC) candidate Margritte Sicard and Tooker Gomberg for the New Democratic Party (NDP).

Cauchon, in an interview, saw the election's main issue as job creation and was prepared to campaign on the Liberal record.

In Cauchon's view, providing Quebecers with jobs, a social safety net and general good government are the the best weapons against Quebec separating.

Cauchon says he has also maintained strong contacts with his riding's Jewish community and general constituents, and has passed on its concerns over war criminals to Justice Minister Allan Rock.

While Sarra-Bournet is well aware of the Jewish community's overwhelmingly federalist sympathies, he said he has also maintained close contacts with the community at an official level and "I have been following the Jewish community closely.

"I will be talking to its members," he said. "I'm not sure it's my duty to persuade them to vote Yes [in the next referendum], but the Jewish community has found a very good spokesman if they elect me."

In a general sense Sarra-Bournet said he would campaign on what he said was Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's dismal record of economic and cultural support for Montreal, including Bill C-71, the tobacco legislation that threatens the future viability of several Montreal festivals.

But he also indicated he had Jewish issues at heart, including "war crimes against humanity," he said.

For Sicard, a playwright, city councillor in St. Hippolyte and active community volunteer, national unity is a major issue, and a problem best solved under PC leader Jean Charest.

"If Meech Lake had passed there would be no problem," she said. "He is the man best able to keep the country united."

Outremont

Sicard also feels she will find a sympathetic ear within the riding's Jewish community, which she said, like herself, shares a total commitment to family values and children.

While Sicard admitted to not being all that informed on the war crimes issue, she expressed a commitment to "study it" since there "has to be justice."

Gomberg , an "environmental educator" and journalist, is the riding's only Jewish candidate.

Gomberg frankly acknowledged that despite Outremont garnering the highest level of NDP support in Montreal, it would take "something of a miracle" to take the riding, yet he felt it his duty to bring forward a federalist voice that would maintain social policies he considers to be eviscerated under Liberal or PC regimes.

His is a message, he said, that should resonate within the Jewish community, with its traditions of tikkun olam (repairing the world) and social consciousness.

Gomberg was also outraged by the revelations by Nazi-hunter Steven Rambam about the high number of possible war criminals in Canada.

"He dug up information that the government and police force couldn't," he said.

Flood waters dampen voters' political spirits

By MYRON LOVE
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — While the rest of Canada focuses attention on political leaders crisscrossing the country in search of votes, residents of Winnipeg and southern Manitoba this month only had eyes for the rising waters of the Red River.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's election call was greeted by most southern Manitobans with indifference, as they piled up sandbags to keep flood waters from overwhelming their communities.

This will be an election like no other across Manitoba, where many voters were upset by this month's decision not to delay the June 2 vote until the flood danger had passed completely.

In parts of southern Manitoba, there may be no campaigning at all. Many observers feel the election will favor the incumbent or candidates with instant name recognition.

As things now stand, the Liberals hold 12 of Manitoba's 14 seats and six of seven in Winnipeg, a situation that's expected to change.

The riding of North Winnipeg, for example, where about 40 percent of the city's Jewish population lives, has been represented for the past two Parliaments by Liberal MP Rey Pagtakhan, who took the seat in 1988 from longtime NDP MP David Orlikow.

Pagtakhan is a popular MP, but he will not be defending the area this time. Under redistribution of ridings announced last fall, part of his riding was combined with a rural seat to the north. He has chosen to fight for the rural seat, leaving the north Winnipeg area up for grabs.

The early favorite to take the seat is the NDP candidate, Judy Wasylycia-Leis, a popular former MLA for the area who lost to Pagtakhan last round.

The Liberal candidate is school trustee Judy Opitz Silver, while the Conservative hopeful is Marni Larkin, who ran third in 1993.

The majority of Winnipeg's Jewish population live in the southern ridings represented by Lloyd Axworthy, minister of Foreign Affairs, and Reg Alcock.

Axworthy has held his seat since 1979. The most popular politician in Winnipeg, he is seen as a shoo-in for re-election.

Alcock won his traditionally Conservative riding in 1993, defeating provincial Tory cabinet minister Dorothy Dobbie. He is one of those incumbents who may benefit from the name recognition that goes with a shortened campaign.

Duceppe backs war crimes deportations

MONTREAL — Bloc Québécois (BQ) leader Gilles Duceppe threw his support behind efforts to have Ottawa speed up the deportation process against Nazi war criminal in Canada.

In a statement issued by the BQ press office on May 5 — Yom Hashoah and the day of a mass Jewish community rally on Nazi war criminals — Duceppe sent a written message to Canadian Jewish Congress expressing his solidarity.

"The attitude of the federal government on this issue concerns me greatly," Duceppe wrote.

"Despite the evidence and the brimming files that have been prepared on the subject, the Canadian government remains deaf to the claims of your community which demand justice.

Argentine justice falling short

By MORRIS ZBAR

For any country to be considered as a member of the family of civilized nations, it must adhere to the biblical injunction found in the Book of Deuteronomy... "Justice, justice, alone shall you pursue so that you may dwell and thrive in the house that the Lord your God has built."

Sadly for the world in general and the Jewish community in particular, Argentina has not met the standard.

After an all-night flight, my colleagues and I arrived in Buenos Aries. We were invited, as Mandel Fellows, to spend a week or so in Argentina and Uruguay, learning about the Jewish communities in the two nations, where we were hosted by the staff of the American Joint Distribution Committee.

Instead of the few hours of rest we were anticipating, we were immediately taken to the Plaza Lavelle, which faces the Courts of Justice building, to participate in the weekly demonstration staged by Memoria Activa. Week after week, Memory and Action reminds the Argentinian government and the world that the souls of those killed in the combined bombings of the Israeli Embassy (March 11, 1992) and AMIA, the Central Jewish Community building, (July 19, 1994) cannot be at peace until justice is done.

Memory and Action, a grassroots organization formed by the families of victims and others concerned about justice, has arisen as a spontaneous manifestation of the Jewish community's anguish. The weekly vigils include remembrance of the individuals killed and also legitimate demands for the government to complete the legal process.

To date, the government has not responded in a way that is consistent with the precepts of a civil and democratic society. The Argentinian government has refused to investigate the possible linkages between the two bombings. Two different judicial bodies are formally investigating the attacks and there is no direct coordination allowed.

Both investigations are limited in their scope. A review of police surveillance of the sites is not being undertaken. There are serious questions about the performance of the police function prior to both bombings.

Other shortcomings in the investigations should be addressed by the appropriate Argentine authorities.

It is clear that the Jews of Canada must show solidarity with our brothers and sisters in Argentina. We must remember those who died, and demonstrate our collective grief to the Jews of Argentina with both public and private memorials on July 18. We should petition the Canadian Department of Foreign Affairs to remind their Argentinian colleagues that justice must be done. MPs should be contacted and the situation explained to further increase pressure on the Argentinian government. We must meet with Argentinian diplomatic officials in Canada and remind them that the world will not permit this tragedy to be forgotten.

The Jews of Argentina and the blessed memory of those lost in the two bombings demand this of us. We must not shirk this obligation. The notion of klal Israel is one that we should take seriously especially in these circumstances.

Morris Zbar is director of community planning and allocations and the associate director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The 'vanishing' Jew

The Vanishing American Jew*, by Alan M. Dershowitz (Little Brown Press, $33.95)

Will there be a viable North American Jewish community in 75 years? Not likely, concludes Alan Dershowitz, when we consider the state of intermarriage, widespread assimilation and the low birth rate. In addition, there is the marked decline in Jewish literacy. "No group in America is less knowledgeable about its traditions, less literate in its language, less familiar with its own library, than the Jews." Thus, the outlook appears bleak for North American Jewry — and indeed for all of Diaspora Jewry.

The author, a professor at Harvard Law School, former appellate lawyer on the O.J. Simpson defence team, and best-selling author, seems tireless. He is a frequent TV and radio commentator and a popular newspaper columnist. Since his book, Chutzpah (1991), he has addressed more than 100,000 Jews in cities across North America.

Dershowitz is a passionate Jew and an unvarnished political liberal. He is independent and outspoken: "I don't have an agenda. I'm not a rabbi. I'm not concerned about stepping on Jewish toes. I take on this project as if I were a lawyer asked to defend the Jewish future."

Anti-Semitism, in one form or another used to unify the Jewish community, but is no longer a serious threat. "The skinheads, militias, Holocaust deniers, and Farrakhan followers have become marginalized." Institutional anti-Semitism is on the wane. Bigots and hate groups have to be carefully watched, but they have no significant day-by-day impact on the lives of most Jews.

Canadian readers will be interested in his impressions that the Ernst Zundel trials were mishandled by the Toronto community. "A trial is simply the wrong vehicle for educating the public about the truth of the Holocaust, because 'truth' is never the issue in such a trial. The issue is always freedom of speech. The defendant becomes the free-speech martyr, and his free speech gets free and often sympathetic press coverage from a media that is sensitive to any threats to its own freedom of expression."

Intermarriage is for him not just an abstract or a statistical subject. It has deep emotional overtones. His son married a Roman Catholic and he is troubled that his grandchildren — even if raised as Jews — will not be considered Jews by at least some segments of the community.

He believes, however, that threats, guilt, and other conventional mechanisms for discouraging intermarriage do not work. "We must learn how to deal with that reality in the most constructive manner possible. A half-Jewish grandchild who is proud of his or her Jewish heritage is preferable, from a Jewish perspective, to a grandchild who completely rejects it. A non-Jewish son-in-law or daughter-in-law who loves Judaism and Jewish life is better than one who resents it. If we cannot fight our children's mixed marriage, we must try to get these children to join us."

If the author's many-sided analysis of the problems of Jewish drift and indifference are absorbing and cogent, his solutions to the problem are disappearing. What are they? He underscores the importance of education. Why shouldn't community resources be shifted from the defence organizations to this vital need? This emphasis must include both children and adults. "If learning is indeed the secret of Jewish survival, then unless we can reverse the trend toward Jewish ignorance we are doomed."

In addition, he calls for a program of enlightened outreach toward the intermarried that will bring into the orbit of the synagogue and Jewish life, an increased appreciation of the contribution of secular Judaism and the need for inspiring new leadership. Acknowledging that these necessary changes will be difficult, he remains cautiously optimistic that the coming era can be a time of fruitful renewal.

The author's frequent digressions include a variety of controversial issues: patrilineal descent, the necessity for pluralism in Jewish life, and how to confront Israel's theological dilemmas.

In keeping with his reputation as a renowned teacher and advocate, Dershowitz presents his arguments, candidly, provocatively and with refreshing humor. This outspoken and sobering account raises critical and vital questions. Every concerned Jew should be interested.

Democracy Israel's greatest strength: Campbell

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's critics often forget that it's a democracy, said Kim Campbell at a recent Toronto Hadassah-WIZO luncheon.

Tempering her words with realism, the former Canadian prime minister (the first woman to attain that position) who is now Canada's consul general in Los Angeles, noted that Israel, like Canada and other democracies, "may sometimes disappoint.

"A democracy is not a precision tool," she said. "It's a blunt instrument. But [Israel] is a democracy...This is what gives Israel its moral authority, and that's what gives it its strength and resilience."

Democracy is "so much better than any of the alternatives that it behooves us to fight for it," she said.

Reflecting on her own political career which spanned all three levels of government, Campbell, 50, linked it with the volunteerism being celebrated at the annual Youth Aliyah luncheon, which supports projects helping disadvantaged youth in Israel. Both volunteerism and politics are ways of being involved in one's community, suggested Campbell.

Other speakers at the luncheon included Dora Kichler, Youth Aliyah/youth services campaign chair, Toronto Hadassah-WIZO; Vivien Sharon, president Toronto Hadassah-WIZO; Sharon Kroft, vice-president, Toronto Hadassah-WIZO; Ruti Kinar representing the consul general of Israel; and Isabel Bassett, MPP, representing the province of Ontario. The Bialik Hebrew Day School children's choir gave a special presentation.

In Campbell's current position, one of her roles is to communicate the differences between Canada and the United States.

For Canadians, "one of the problems we have with American domination of our media is that we think we know much more about the United States than we really do."

Kim Campbell

In California, for example, the white population will be outnumbered by Hispanics and other visible minorities by the turn of the century, she said.

"We really think we're the only country in the world that deals with language divisions or regional divisions...Americans are facing these same challenges, but from a different perspective," she said. "I think in some ways it's a more troubling perspective because there's no institutional framework to look at these issues."

A trailblazer for women leaders, Campbell believes she helped "redefine people's expectations...We're all subliminally conditioned to expect certain kinds of people to do certain kinds of jobs."

While it's important not to overstate gender differences, said Campbell, studies show that women and men have had different leadership styles and different communication styles. The latter, which includes women being more likely than men to downplay their certainty, can lead capable women to appear lacking in confidence, she noted.

Campbell, who said she has been described as arrogant, doesn't think her own style of speech is typically female.

In addressing the mostly female audience of 170 people, she didn't shy away from addressing the brevity of her tenure as prime minister.

"I can hardly complain about having lost an election in 1993," she said. "If one can put a small tile in the mosaic of human progress, I think you're very privileged indeed."

Heritage Front closes phone line

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Heritage Front hotline, the telephone message machine that landed the white supremacist group into hot water on more than one occasion, is shutting down.

A message on the hotline last week announced that in the wake of legal "persecution" and given the commitment needed to maintain the hotline, it had become a liability and would be terminated. Instead, the Heritage Front would continue to disseminate its message through the Internet and other new technologies.

The announcement was treated as a partial victory by one of the Jewish community's leading anti-racist spokespersons.

Bernie Farber, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said "the Heritage Front is nowhere right now. It's a mere shadow of what it once was."

Leaders who took the Heritage Front to the forefront of the Canadian racist movement in the early '90s have left the group. Its main organizer, Grant Bristow, was shown to be a CSIS mole, George Burdi is serving a one-year jail sentence for assault and Wolfgang Droege is facing charges for car theft, Farber said.

Continued confrontations by anti-racists have also worn down the white supremacist group. Complaints to the Canadian Human Rights Commission have led to orders limiting content of the hotline and several members of the white supremacist organization were jailed for violating those orders.

Farber said broad-based public education efforts have diluted the Heritage Front's appeal to potential young recruits. That, coupled with the fact that its leaders have gotten in trouble with the law, has weakened the Heritage Front and reduced its credibility when it attempts to recruit new members, he added.

Sexism in Conservative movement explored

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Preliminary cautions by the moderator of a recent panel discussion underscored the delicate nature and underlying controversy of the evening's topic: Conservative Sexism??? Does It Exist?

"This evening should not be perceived as a threat. No theology is on trial," said human rights consultant Toni Silberman at the recent town hall forum held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue by its sisterhood.

Because of "the nature of the subject," the audience of about 175 people, at least half of whom were shul members, was given the option of writing questions rather than using the microphones provided.

Rabbi Adina Lewittes, assistant dean of the rabbinical school of the Conservative Movement's Jewish Theological Seminary, led off the discussion. Also speaking were Judy Feld Carr, first woman president of Beth Tzedec Congregation; Deborah Spiegel, assistant director of the Conservative movement's Camp Ramah in Canada and member of the Orthodox Shaarei Shomayim Congregation; and Melva Novak, former principal of a Conservative day school in the United States.

Feld Carr, best known for her dramatic role in the rescue of the Syrian Jewish community, pulled no punches about women's roles in Canadian Conservative synagogues. Women here "face a veritable desert...Apart from a few synagogues across the country [including an egalitarian one in Richmond Hill, noted an audience member], the role of women is primarily to participate communally as part of the congregation and to act as a bystander to men."

Women entitled to open the ark

At Beth Tzedec, unlike most of its local Conservative counterparts, women are entitled to open the ark and receive aliyot without restrictions.

But the changes at Beth Tzedec came about only three years ago, after a group of members began to sensitize others to the issues. Eventually 1,200 people signed a petition demanding the expansion of women's roles in the services, said Feld Carr.

The hiring of Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, the study sessions he gave on the role of women from a halachic perspective and his writing of a detailed responsum all led up to the granting of aliyot to women, said Feld Carr.

Prior to adopting its new policy, the shul was losing young members, she indicated. "We were wondering, 'Where are all the young people?'

"You know where they are. At the Narayever [an egalitarian congregation]. Young women left our shul because there was no place for them."

Because the changes came about through "evolution, not revolution, this kept the congregation intact," said Feld Carr. Only six of the 2,700 member families left the congrgation because they objected to the changes, she noted.

Likewise in the greater Conservative movement, changes have evolved over time, said Rabbi Lewittes.

The 1983 decision to ordain women as Conservative rabbis was part of a 60-year process, she said. The issue of women's aliyot arose in 1955, "well before feminism. Rabbis said, 'How could we give our young daughters the same educational opportunities [as boys] and not allow them to employ those skills?' "

The issues have "great emotional import," said Rabbi Lewittes, who was raised in a "modern Orthodox community" in Montreal, and underwent "a transforming experience" at age 20, reading from the Torah for the first time at Camp Ramah. "The world of traditional Jewish learning and full participation for women came together for me."

At Beth Tikvah, a proportionately small group of women (and some men) is still struggling to integrate those aspects. At a lecture last month on Women's Spirituality, an audience member said she feels "like furniture" at Beth Tikvah. "We are making small strides, but the reality is, if there are not 10 men, I cannot say Kaddish."

Young members leaving congregation

A founding member of Beth Tikvah noted that young members are leaving the congregation. "We built it for our spiritual needs and for a long time it sufficed, but ...times have changed."

When it comes to official sanction for making changes, Rabbi Lewittes explained that while Conservative Judaism uses a halachic framework, the movement accepts the notion of "halachic pluralism," accepting that there can be more than one valid opinion on a given halachic issue.

Complicating matters further is that every rabbi is considered the halachic authority for his or her own community, she noted.

On the issue of women's aliyot, for example, talmudic contraindications include a prohibition against reading in public "because of the honor of the congregation." That is now subject to rabbinic reinterpretation, said Rabbi Lewittes, because society has changed. Nonetheless, the Conservative movement encompasses positions both for and against women's aliyot.

Novak discussed developments within the Orthodox feminist movement "in the hope that we as women will be able to bridge the growing chasm."

Spiegel, a product of the Ramah camp system who became observant as an adult, is involved with Reform, Conservative and Orthodox segments of the population. When she teaches at Holy Blossom Temple, she said, she's "certainly not there to convert but to educate."

And the support she received "from all facets of the community" when her young daughter was seriously ill "allowed me to believe G-d really exists."

Camp Ramah's egalitarian policy, permitting girls to read from the Torah, "presents a unique opportunity for many Toronto-area girls," Spiegel said.

"If we want to assist in shaping the nature of our synagogue," said Feld Carr, "we cannot merely express ourselves through women's organizations such as sisterhoods, no matter how wonderful they are. We have so much more to do."

Comic actresses Chaya Smukler (left) and Sheri Wise performed at a recent spring fashion show, "Jewish Women Leading the Way," held at B'nai Brith's Hove Street headquarters. Over 50 volunteers, chaired by Irina Petrini, organized the fundraiser, which included a women's and children's fashion show, music, skits and a d'var Torah. Nearly 300 women attended the event, proceeds from which went to the Rabbi Hirsch Rabisky Congregation, located at 15 Torresdale Ave., and serving Toronto's growing Russian-Jewish community.

Irvin Strub founded pickle company

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Obituary

TORONTO — Irvin Strub, founder of the well-known Strub Brothers Ltd. pickle business, died recently in Toronto. He was 86.

Strub was born in Russia in 1910 and came to Canada in 1926. When the family's first business ventures fell on hard times, they began to sell pickles, made according to an old family recipe, to a local deli.

The new venture proved popular, and Irvin, his brother Dan, and their father expanded pickle production, first into their backyard, then to a facility in Dundas.

Members of the family did everything, says daughter Doris Strub Epstein, from buying the cucumbers, to producing the pickles, to marketing and delivering.

The plant expanded several times, until the Strubs opened their most recent plant in Brantford, in 1991.

Although Irvin stepped down from the company in 1986, he remained involved and interested, even having an office in the new facility.

While her father was "not an organization man," Strub Epstein said, he was involved with his synagogue, Adas Israel, and Shalom Village, a nursing home in Hamilton.

He began a series of visits to the former Soviet Union, and "helped countless people, bringing them money, medicines and other hard to get items."

The family never knew exactly what he accomplished there, she said, because he didn't talk about it.

Strub's first wife, Annie, died in 1963. He is survived by his wife Evelyn, his other children Leo, Harry, Danny and Esther Erez, 16 grandchildren and 16 great-grandchildren.

GRANTS COVER FAR CORNERS OF COMMUNITY

Over $100,000 recently changed hands in round three of UJA Federation's continuity grant series. The Action Committee for Jewish Continuity (ACJC) allocated $120,000 to 19 projects representing a cross-section of the community, from Orthodox groups to interfaith families.

The diversity of the grant recipients is "fundamental to the success of this effort," said ACJC chairman Les Klein. "No single program answers the needs of all Jews."

Many proposals stemmed from young people, including one put forward by several members of UJA Federation's Young Leadership Development Program to strengthen Jewish identity in mixed marriages. Yeshiva Tomar Devorah will be conducting Torah study classes for young men attending university or working in the community.

Grants were awarded to groups involved in outreach to Jewish immigrants or Toronto residents from non-Canadian backgrounds. Volunteers from Beth Jacob girls school received money for a Shabbaton they will be holding for Russian families.

Another grant recipient is the Maccabi Toronto Soccer Club, which is currently fielding four Jewish amateur teams at the upcoming Maccabi Games in Israel.

Two groups focusing on the needs of Israelis living in Canada, the Israeli Association of Greater Toronto and Tzabar Toronto, which is affiliated with the Boy and Girl Scouts Federation in Israel, received ACJC grants. Both groups run their programs in Hebrew.

HaMachon, a leadership training program for high school students, run by Canadian Young Judea, is also an ACJC beneficiary.

Children's production portrays tragedy and hope

Recently, 38 children gathered at B'nai Brith Canada headquarters for their first rehearsal of Brundibar, a children's opera written in 1938 by Czech-Jewish composer Hans Krasa, a concentration camp inmate.

Brundibar, first staged by Krasa in 1943 at Theresienstadt (Terezin), the camp displayed by the Nazis to the world as a "model" facility, was performed 55 times by a cast of 50 children. Most of these children, along with the composer, perished in Auschwitz.

The current cast of kids, the second in Toronto to perform the opera, will be giving workshop performances at the Lipa Green Building Holocaust Memorial Centre and other venues. Development money has been provided by a grant from UJA Federation's Action Committee for Jewish Continuity.

This project is headed by children's entertainer and educator Helena Fine, who was the driving force behind last year's staging of Brundibar.

"One of the reasons we wanted to stage Brundibar in Toronto is because we believe it has tremendous potential for education," Fine said in a recent interview. "Culture is a powerful tool for strengthening Jewish identity."

She noted that the Brundibar experience spurred many of the young performers to examine their roots and ask questions of their parents and grandparents.

Pnina Zilberman, director of UJA Federation's Holocaust Remembrance Committee, said Brundibar is an excellent tool for teaching the Holocaust to children in grades 4 and 5.

Fine said she first became interested in staging Brundibar after her friend, Torontonian John Freund, a former inmate of Terezin, who had seen a performance by the original Brundibar cast, told her about the opera and its tragic history.

After listening to a tape of a contemporary Czech production, Fine "was hooked," she said. "The music was delightful. It was a story of hope.... It was something new. Here I had a story that hadn't been told and needed to be told."

Funding in their hands

Parents of children with special needs have a new forum - a Toronto-based magazine called b'yadeinu, (In our hands), the recipient of a UJA Federation continuity grant.

Published quarterly, b'yadeinu, which debuted in December 1996, is the brainchild of Susie Mittelman-Sokol, the magazine's editor.

The parent of a 12-year old child with special needs, Mittelman-Sokol recognized that she and other Jewish parents in her situation could benefit from their own publication. B'yadeinu is produced on a shoe-string budget by Mittelman-Sokol and her cousin Jean Rodak, a designer and illustrator.

"It's an inexpensive and easy way to reach out to other families with special needs children," said Mittelman-Sokol. "It's a vehicle for venting, sharing, learning, chizuk (strength) and connecting with the rest of the community."

The money was "sorely needed to firmly develop the magazine as a viable entity," Mittelman-Sokol noted. "Costs are minimal and energy, intentions and dedication remain high."

She stressed that b'yadeinu also seeks to educate professionals and rabbis about special needs children so they can try harder to integrate them into the community.

With Mittelman-Sokol's busy schedule -- a mother of five, she drives in four car pools -- it's difficult for the two cousins to find time to meet, so they often hold editorial meetings during car pool. "I drive with Susie to do the car pool and that's when we work things out," Rodak said.

The glossy magazine which started with 23 pages, expanded to 34 pages by the March issue. The features include news from across Canada with contributions from New York and Israel.

JEWISH LIFE IN UNLIKELY LOCATIONS

Three Jewish grassroots groups which began sprouting in inner city neighbourhoods — the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre, the Danforth Jewish Circle and the High Park area Jewish Community Association — have been awarded continuity grants by UJA Federation.

The Riverdale Jewish Community Centre made headlines three years ago when it held High Holiday services in a Greek restaurant.

Documentary filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, a Riverdale founder, and his wife Nicole, were initially torn between moving out of Riverdale to live close to a shul and staying in the area to start one. "I consulted with a rabbi and he told me 'you're supposed to light a match where there is darkness. Stay where you are and start a shul.' "

A local public health office served as a make-shift shul for Saturday morning services for a year and a half until last Shavuot when the group moved into its permanent home, a converted karate studio on the Danforth.

This fall, the Community Centre will embark on a new project to encourage and strengthen Jewish identity among Riverdale residents.

"We want to involve community members in hands-on programming like drama, visual art and film to explore themes of Jewish identity," said Sara Jacobovici.

The Danforth Jewish Circle is comprised of residents seeking a liberal outlook.

The fledgling group held High Holiday services, at Eastminster United Church, attracting more than 300 local residents, many of whom are in interfaith marriages.

Since then, the year-old Danforth Jewish Circle has held Chanukah and Purim parties, a third Seder and regular Shabbat programs.

A monthly newsletter goes out to more than 200 households on the mailing list, which has grown dramatically since the High Holidays. According to Board member Tanya Luder, people have been drawn to the Danforth Jewish Circle because of its emphasis on inclusiveness. "With the high rate of interfaith marriages we want non-Jewish spouses to feel welcome."

Across town, some 50 Jewish families from Parkdale, Swansea, Bloor West Village and Etobicoke make up the West End Jewish Community Association. "We really liked living in the west end and we wanted to create a Jewish presence here," said Francine Dick, one of the Association's founding members.

The seven-year-old group has revitalized the Knesseth Israel Synagogue (Junction shul), which, until recently, was only open on the High Holidays. "A few years ago they began to have a megillah reading for the first time in a generation in response to our request," Dick noted.

Taking tradition to the core

On Erev Shabbat, some half dozen young adults in their 20s and 30s gather in the tiny vintage kitchen of the Minsker Shul to prepare Shabbat dinner, a weekly communal meal sponsored by the congregation.

The Shabbat supper, open to anyone in the community, is the cornerstone of the shul's outreach program, which also includes bi-weekly study classes, Shabbat lunches, week-end Shabbatons and special events. The Minsker was recently awarded a UJA Federation continuity grant for its outreach work in the downtown area.

The shul, a tall domed structure built in 1930, is sandwiched between Chinatown and Kensington Market, a neighborhood that was once the centre of Jewish life in Toronto.

Rabbi Schmuel Spero, the spiritual leader since 1988, said an aging Jewish population with businesses in the downtown core had been supporting the shul, but as their numbers dwindled, it was necessary to attract younger members.

The Minsker has become "a social and spiritual hub" characterized by the "openness and informality of the downtown experience," Rabbi Spero said.

According to president Mel Litman, the shul's informal atmosphere attracts visitors to the Shabbat dinners who are unfamiliar with the songs, candle lighting, kiddush and other Shabbat traditions.

"Experiencing Shabbat in this hands-on manner is a non-threatening way of teaching the traditions and strengthening Jewish identity," Litman emphasized. "People come because they feel comfortable and want to learn more."

SINGLES SUPPORT

For the last three years, Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning has been holding educational programs with a social component for singles during the winter holidays.

Kolel executive director, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, says these sessions were so successful, some participants began approaching her about holding more events.

UJA Federation's continuity grant will fund six evenings where singles will study and schmooze together. "Jews who want more commitment and knowledge and more spirituality will be able to meet like-minded people," Rabbi Goldstein explains.

The evenings, which will be held in three different locations: downtown, mid-town and Thornhill, will target specific age groups.

Although a lot of dating goes on through Kolel -- there have already been two marriages -- Rabbi Goldstein stresses the program is not a dating service, but, she says, it's a "great feeling" when people meet each other through the study of Torah.

Penny Edwards, who, for the last six years, has been working with single Jewish parents, received a grant to hold monthly programs for them and their children.

The programs will be infused with "Yiddishkeit," promised Edwards, a recreational therapist. "There's a real need for it," she says. "There are all kinds of things out there, but few are family oriented."

In the past, Edwards has organized successful Chanukah and Purim parties. Now she's planning to add Oneg Shabbat evenings.

"I want to provide many opportunities," she says, "for Jewish single parents and their children to meet each other through positive recreational events."

Jewish Soccer Tournament

The Toronto Maccabi soccer club (pictured left are some of the team members) will be a part of the first International Jewish soccer tournament in North America, to be held in Toronto in the summer of 1998.

Tournament organizer Martin Scott is using the funding he received from UJA Federation to help promote what he hopes will become a quadrennial event.

FORGOTTEN VICTIMS:
When Children Witness Woman Abuse

BY SUSAN BROTMAN

Children are affected by what they see and hear, and by their home environment. Children who grow up in homes where their father is abusive towards their mother learn this strategy as a way to solve problems, deal with frustration and meet their needs.

In families with woman abuse:

- abuse is used to control the behaviour of others
- communication skills are often poor
- families may be isolated from their communities
- others are blamed for one's own thoughts, actions and feelings
- expressing feelings is seen as a weakness
- marriage is often characterized by rigid gender stereotypes.

(from A Handbook for the Prevention of Family Violence. "The Effects on Children Who Witness Wife Assault," 1990.)

Children in such families are at an increased risk of becoming involved in an abusive relationship, either as perpetrator or as victim, thus continuing the cycle of abuse across the generations (Ontario Women's Directorate, 1993).

Children who witness wife abuse can be left with many legacies as they grow and develop. Preschoolers (birth to 5 years) may have physical complaints, such as stomach aches or headaches and sleep disturbances or they may fail to thrive or develop properly. School aged children (6-12 years) may hang around their home believing their presence could protect their mother, or they may avoid home, believing their absence will improve the relationship. They may fear being abandoned or killed, or fear anger — their own or others'.

Girls tend to keep their emotions inside, displaying somatic complaints and withdrawn behaviour. Boys often demonstrate temper tantrums, fighting and bullying. Adolescents may use drugs or alcohol, run away from home, become involved in criminal activities, have suicidal thoughts, or escape into pregnancy and/or early marriage (Unity House Child Care Program Manual. " Effect of Witnessing Wife Assault on Children".)

The average length of time in which Jewish women stay with their abusive partners is approximately double that of non-Jewish women (Blumenstein, 1990). We are dealing with children, in whom patterns of negative behaviour may become more entrenched because they have witnessed abuse for many more years than their non-Jewish counterparts.

"Many families may find it difficult to approach JF&CS for service because of the deep shame they feel as Jewish women, wives and mothers."

Many children, who have never spoken about the abuse they have seen at home consider it helpful to talk about it with people in similar situations. Group therapy is the preferred treatment approach for child witnesses; however, some may require alternate treatment. Unfortunately, due to government cutbacks, some programs for children who have witnessed woman abuse are being jeopardized.

At JF&CS, The Children Witnessing Violence Program, serves children both individually and in groups. This program, beginning in February 1995, was made possible through the generous financial support of a donor.

Many women calling JF&CS who are experiencing abuse do not initially identify themselves as abused women. After a period of involvement, it's found that woman abuse is the primary issue. We believe many families may find it difficult to approach JF&CS for service because of the "shonda" (deep shame) they feel as Jewish women, wives and mothers. As community awareness increases, we hope that more men and women will reach out for service. For additional information, call JF&CS at (416) 638-7800.

Susan Brotman, M.S.W., is coordinator of the JF&CS Children Witnessing Violence Program.

ELDER ABUSE: Breaking the Silence

BY SHEILA ZANE AND BLANCHE WISEMAN

If you were an older person being mistreated or cheated by someone close to you, would you tell anyone about it? Probably not. Many older people are embarrassed or afraid to admit they are being abused by someone they trust.

Abuse, an issue of power and control, can be executed in a variety of ways.

It can be FINANCIAL through loss of control over bank accounts and pension cheques, theft of personal possessions or forgery.

Abuse can be EMOTIONAL with insults, humiliation, intimidation and isolation from other family and friends.

It can be SEXUAL or PHYSICAL by pushing, pinching, slapping and other forms of assault.

Abuse can also mean basic NEGLECT demonstrated by, among other things, withholding food or clothing; providing insufficient or too much medication; or refusing to allow home support services.

Studies show that elder abuse occurs just as much in our own Jewish community as it does in every other community and women in families with a history of violence are particularly vulnerable. How much more difficult it is for these women to admit abuse when they may depend upon their abusers for care! Fear, shame and ignorance about alternatives may prevent them from seeking help. Commonly, older victims are isolated in their homes with no one knowing what's going on. Cutbacks to community services such as transportation, health care and low cost housing increase the risk of abuse.

How do you know if someone is being abused? Here's what to look for (these indicators on their own may not be the result of abuse):

- depression, fear, anxiety or passivity
- unexplained physical injuries
- dehydration or lack of food
- over-sedation
- unexplained shortage of funds or missing possessions
- lack of personal hygiene

If you suspect an older person is being abused, be there to listen, with reassurances that he or she is not to blame, and offer to contact an outside agency, or the police in serious cases.

Seniors at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, a UJA Federation beneficiary agency, are pioneers in educating the community through their Awareness Project on Abuse of the Elderly. Not only is the Centre a resource for elder abuse information, it sponsors a group of volunteer actors who present and discuss three original vignettes on the subject. The Awareness Project Players have performed for other seniors, families, professionals and students throughout southern Ontario. The Bernard Betel Centre and JF&CS were the first to initiate a support group for older abused women at the Centre.

The issue of elder abuse is only gradually being recognized as a serious social problem. There are no easy answers. Abuse is particularly horrifying when it happens to older people with more complex problems and fewer choices than those who are younger. We should be striving to provide accessible transportation, counselling, emergency accommodation and affordable housing so that older people can live out their lives with self-respect and dignity. Isolation goes hand in hand with elder abuse.

If you are looking for a meaningful volunteer job that could help to prevent abuse, consider becoming a driver, a friendly visitor, or a "buddy" to an abused woman. Contact the Bernard Betel Centre, Senior Care or Jewish Family and Child Service for information.

Le Royal Casablanca offers taste of Morocco

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — If you want to take a trip to Morocco and can't do it right now, a meal at the recently opened Le Royal Casablanca restaurant will transport you for an hour or two to a little piece of Morocco right in the heart of Toronto.

Located at 3428 Bathurst St., between Lawrence and Wilson avenues, the Middle Eastern restaurant looks like the finest dining rooms in Morocco.

The menu includes chicken or beef kabobs, lamb shish kabob, merguez, shawarma, lamb onion tagine served with couscous and Moroccan salads and pastries such as chabakia, baklava and ghoriba. And there are Ashkenazi and vegetarian dishes for those who prefer them.

Owner Maurice (Moshe) Amar has spared no effort to make the venue, the food and the music reflect a genuine Moroccan mood.

Born in Casablanca, Amar and his wife Ruth came to Canada in 1992.

He worked in the catering business in Paris and Casablanca and studied patisserie in France under patissière Gaston Lenotre.

In Canada, he worked in catering and opened a patisserie on Sheppard Avenue. Last November, he realized his dream and opened Le Royal Casablanca. He was involved in designing and decorating the restaurant, which has a warm and welcoming atmosphere.

Along with painted scenes of his native homeland, there is a draped ceiling and cabinets with samovars, Moroccan china and glasses, a tea service and other objects that he brought from Morocco. These are not only on display, but used in serving his customers.

Pictures of international celebrities who have visited the restaurant are displayed at the entrance, including a photo of Prince Mouley Rashid, son of King Hassan II of Morocco, and Moroccan government representatives.

Recently, when the prince was in Toronto, Amar catered a banquet for some 1,000 people from the Moroccan Sephardi community. He is the official caterer for the national tourist office of Morocco and Royal Air Maroc (Morocco's national airline).

In his spotless kitchen, which is supervised by the Kashruth Council of Toronto, Amar explained that everything is made fresh to order, there are no preservatives or artificial flavorings and he uses original Moroccan spices.

As well as operating Le Royal Casablanca and a busy catering business, Amar is working on two Sephardi cookbooks, one containing Moroccan recipes and the other a book of pastries. He says that the cookbooks will be available this summer.

Holocaust Awards

TORONTO — Yad b'Yad is a non-profit organization recently created and financed by a diverse group of Jewish Canadians whose hope is to inspire, encourage and, most importantly, recognize and listen to the personal responses of students as they learn about the Holocaust from their studies, friends and families and the media.

The Yad b'Yad Expressions Of The Holocaust Awards program is a pilot project conceived to elicit those responses in creative and artistic works.

Here are the names of this years winners:

A CELEBRATION OF LIFE

JF&CS launches Friends Campaign

TORONTO — Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) has launched its 14th annual Friends Campaign in an effort to raise funds directly from the community.

Last year's Friends' drive raised $225,000, and at least that much is hoped for this year, the agency says.

In a letter mailed out to 7,000 Metro households, 1997 Friends Campaign chair Garry Foster notes that one in six Jews lives in poverty and that the number of children requiring foster care has risen sharply.

Money raised above and beyond the funds JF&CS receives from the government and United Jewish Appeal goes toward sending kids to summer camp, help at Passover, and Hebrew and Russian outreach.

Years of cutbacks from the province have meant that the number of Jews in crisis the agency helps yearly — about 10,000 — continues to grow.

For information, call 416-638-7800.

ALL MONUMENTS ARE NOT CREATED EQUAL

ABOUT PEOPLE

Sarah Pachter

PACHTER HONORED

State of Israel Bonds is honoring travel agent and community activist Sara Pachter, Wednesday, May 21, at Holy Blossom Temple, for her long service to Israel.

In her career as travel guide, Pachter has led 132 trips to Israel and has been honored by El Al and the Israel government. She was the only Canadian sent to Israel after the Six Day War, and led three groups during the Gulf War.

The tribute evening will feature The Three Cantors, an exhibit of photographs from trips to Israel and celebrity guests.

No paid holy days

Days as paid days off, they would have three more days of mandatory leave with pay for religious purposes than non-Jews.

"Nothing would then prevent Christians from claiming they are also entitled to more days of religious observance as leave with pay days," the judgment states.

As well, allowing Jewish employees to work Christmas and Good Friday in exchange for paid leave on the High Holy Days, would violate collective agreements and the federal Labor Code, the court said.

But in a strongly worded dissenting opinion, Justice Joseph Robertson pointed out that collective agreements allow paid absences for a variety of secular needs, including inclement weather, voting and even defective plumbing.

"Surely the spiritual needs of an employee are as compelling as those of the secular kind," Robertson wrote. "I fail to see why Jewish employees should be denied leave with pay when employees generally are being accommodated in less compelling circumstances."

Robertson relied extensively on a 1994 decision from the Supreme Court of Canada, which ruled 9-0 that three Jewish teachers in Quebec had been wrongly docked a day's pay for observing Yom Kippur.

The academic calendar had the effect of discriminating against Jewish teachers and the school board had failed to accommodate them, the Supreme Court had found.

In this case, Robertson said, Jewish employees, in contrast to their Christian colleagues, must take at least one, if not three days off, without pay, to celebrate the High Holy Days.

He added that he's not prepared to say the employer had satisfied its duty to accommodate.

"Why would one begrudge a Jewish employee paid leave to observe his or her holy days?" he asked.

Richmond, who works for the Public Service Commission, told The CJN he began questioning the policy of paid leave around 1992. Until then, he was allowed to take time off to observe Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, but was required to use vacation time or hours he had accumulated working overtime to make up for his absence.

Richmond, a member of the Reconstructionist Darchei Noam synagogue, said his union plans to seek leave to appeal the ruling to the Supreme Court of Canada.

"Given the federal government's policy on multiculturalism, the issue comes down to whether it really means it," he said.

War crimes case

part in the shootings of Jews and the brutal interrogation of prisoners.

But Bogutin's lawyer, Orest Rudzik, painted a very different picture of Bogutin, saying he was the son of a Jewish mining engineer and a Ukrainian mother who, with the help of his mother, got a job as a warehouseman and later as a postman for the Ukrainian police. They were jobs, Rudzik said, that Bogutin and his mother hoped would render him inconspicuous to the German authorities.

Bogutin, 88, was not in court on Monday. Rudzik said his client's health did not permit it.

Four days of court time have been set aside for the case this week. Court will then adjourn and the commission will convene in Donetsk, Ukraine, from May 26 to June 13 to hear the evidence of nine crown and three or four defence witnesses. The case will resume in Toronto after Labor Day.

Documents filed in court last July alleged that from 1941 to 1943, Bogutin was a member of the Selidovka District (Raion) Police, an auxiliary unit under the command of the German Order Police. The documents allege that in the fall of 1941, Bogutin participated in the execution of a Jewish man, his wife, a small child and a former militiaman.

The documents also allege that Bogutin was at the site of an execution of 10 people, including a woman and child, in December 1941. As an investigator with the police unit, the documents state, Bogutin interrogated prisoners, which included beatings, and in spring of 1943, ordered the arrests of young girls for deportation to Germany for forced labor, the documents claim.

Throughout the war, the Selidovka police "participated in the arrests and executions of civilians, including Jews, and members of the Red Army who were prisoners of war. The Selidovka District Police participated in the identification, arrest and interrogation of suspected partisans and communist functionaries, the forcible confinement of civilians as hostages, the confiscation of property for the use of German authorities, as well as the rounding-up of youths for deportation to forced labor to Germany," the allegations state.

Federal authorities are seeking to deport Bogutin for lying about his wartime activities.

Anti-Semitism still part of Russian academia

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prof. Oleg Budnitskii, head of the Russian History department at Russia's Rostov Pedagogical University, brought Jewish studies to his institution some five years ago. For the past year, his university has been involved in an academic exchange program with the Jewish Studies department of York University. Unquestionably, things have changed in Russia since the break-up of the Soviet Union.

But does Budnitskii still experience anti-Semitism in his home academic environment? "Of course," he answered matter-of-factly during a recent visit to Toronto.

Now that Russia is "really not democratic but a free country, this freedom includes the freedom to express anti-Semitism. The university is the same as Russian society," said the 42-year-old Jewish academic, whose lectures to York students were cancelled because of the school's professors' strike. While here as part of a North American trip, Budnitskii met with local colleagues.

A recent rise in Russian nationalism and promotion of "Russian national values" has an accompanying flip side, which is anti-Semitism, he said.

Inaugurating Jewish studies at his university in Rostov-on-Don in southern Russia was "rather difficult," Budnitskii said, although in the early days of his career it was virtually impossible for someone like him — Jewish, and not a member of the Communist party — to attain a full-time academic position.

Rostov, Budnitskii's home town, has a Jewish population of about 10,000. At its height, there were triple or quadruple that number, he noted.

Budnitskii's great-grandfather was among the Rostov Jews who were rounded up and shot by the Nazis in 1942 in nearby Zmyovskaya. Ironically, the well-travelled merchant never believed the stories of mass killings. "I know Germans. They are civilized people. They're not like the Bolsheviks," he would say.

Budnitskii's mother, then 12, and her mother, escaped just hours before the Nazis arrived.

Butdnitskii has been a faculty member in Rostov since 1988. Although he has Jewish colleagues at the university, his position as department head is not typical for a Jewish professor.

Most of his students are non-Jews. The courses, taught by both Jews and non-Jews, are not Jewish studies courses per se, but include Russian Jewish history as part of a broader curriculum.

Prof. Oleg Budnitskii

Research possibilities

Budnitskii was, of necessity, largely self-educated about Jewish history. Sharing his knowledge with non-Jews, many of whom are ignorant or misinformed about Judaism, "will be very important from the point of view of relationships between Jews and non-Jews," he believes. "Our program is not propaganda. It's an academic program. We try to give people correct information about Jews, Jewish history, Jewish mentality and the Jewish approach to some things."

Equally important is the year-old exchange program with York, as part of which York professors have already lectured in Rostov. "It's important for us to receive new knowledge and new methods of teaching," said Budnitskii. The link with a recognized western university "gives some legitimacy to our program."

With the recent opening of Russian archives that were closed during the Soviet regime, the future holds new research possibilities, Budnitskii noted. Holocaust-related material and KGB records of "Zionist underground societies" dating back to the 1920s and 1930s are two examples.

Although Rostov looked "not so great" when Budnitskii returned from an eight-month stint at California's Stanford University, he said he has no plans to leave. "The majority of Russian Jews are people of Jewish consciousness, but Russian culture."

Despite his talk of anti-Semitism, Budnitskii wants to make one thing clear. "If we compare Jewish life in Russia with years ago, there's been great progress. In comparison, we can say Jewish life and Jewish education are flourishing. It's really unbelievable."

Yom Hashoah

Survivors urged to send testimonies to Israel

By CELINE MIGDAL
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — A solemn commemoration of Yom Hashoah, on the theme Unto Every Person There's a Name, took place recently at Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem.

As the silent crowd of 2,000 filled the sanctuary to honor the memory of the six million who perished in the Holocaust, memorial candles were lit and flickered in the hall as names of the martyrs were read out loud.

Israeli Consul General Daniel Gal urged the survivors to send their testimonies to the Yad Vashem Hall in Jerusalem, to ensure their inclusion in the names enshrined in the record there.

"Fifty years after World War II, there still remains an enormous gap in our knowledge of the exact circumstances of the Shoah that resulted in the physical and economic devastation of the Jewish people in the countries involved in that war," Gal said. "It took half a century for France, Switzerland, Austria, Norway, Sweden and others to acknowledge their nations' responsibility, to confront their national memory and accept their culpability in the persecution and destruction of the Jews."

Rabbi Ronald Aigen of Congregation Dorshei Emet said: "We are gathered here today to mourn the loss and pay tribute to six million of our people, a number that staggers the imagination. It is only by reflecting on the lives of specific individuals, that we can begin to comprehend our loss."

A recitation of names of some of the victims by Mira Giberovitch and Barry Rishikof was accompanied by the Shaar Hashomayim Choral Society and Youth Choir, under the direction of Stephen Glass. The choir also performed a rousing version of the Partisans' Song and other selections in English, Hebrew and Yiddish, finishing with Hatikvah.

Three generations — survivors, and children and grandchildren of survivors — lit the six memorial candles, symbolizing the transmission of the Holocaust legacy from one generation to the next.

"The long night of Nazism descended over all of Europe with a darkness of evil that was so dense no light could penetrate it," said Sara Weinberg, chair of the remembrance committee. "Torture and humiliation compounded the suffering of European Jewry.

"The savage extermination of children and the ferocity with which the children were treated prior to their extermination is unmatched in the total history of humanity."

Nevertheless, Jews rebelled, not only in the Warsaw Ghetto, but also in dozens of lesser-known places and their spirit and culture survived, she said.

Continuing in Yiddish and addressing her remarks to the survivors present, she said, "You are the witnesses and survivors from ghettos, concentration camps, forests and other hiding places too incredible and horrible to describe. We admire your fortitude, your determination and your courage to survive and we, your children and grandchildren are your legacy; the proof of your courage and strength."

Survivor Sara Schichter, speaking in French, described how the Germans overran Belgium, her country of origin, in 1940. The persecution of Jews began immediately, she said, and deportations began in July 1942.

"My brother and I received notice to report for work camps in Germany," Schichter said. Having heard rumors about German "goodwill," her family decided to hide.

"My father said, 'I will never send my children of my own free will into the jaws of wolves.'

"We changed hiding places several times and thus delayed our capture. On Nov. 20, 1943, the Gestapo arrived at our door. All that I can remember," she said, her voice breaking, "is, I jumped out the window into the garden, following my brother; and turning for an instant, I saw my mother, in her nightgown on the balcony, with a German soldier pointing his gun at her. That was the last time I saw my mother,

"She and my three brothers perished in the horror of Auschwitz, the place where civilization stopped. I don't know the exact time of their death. I don't have anything tangible of my mother's — all I have is in my heart. The nightmares diminish with time but never stop, yet I have survived to tell my story. Six million others have not."

The commemoration was organized by the remembrance committee of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre, under the auspices of the Consulate General of Israel and in cooperation with many other organizations.

Federal Intergovernmental Affairs Minister Stephane Dion was among a large number of federal, provincial and municipal politicians who attended. Also present was the president of the St. Jean Baptiste Society, Guy Bouthillier.

Yom Hashoah

War veterans, resistance groups honored at memorial service

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is not enough to memorialize the victims of the Holocaust; we must honor the heroic role played by Jewish war veterans, partisans and resistance groups.

"We pay tribute to the Six Million, as we should; we pay tribute to Israel, as we should — but are the sacrifices of the Jews who fought with the Allied forces not worthy of the same respect?" demanded Sam Pasternack of the Royal Canadian Legion, at this year's Yom Hashoah service, sponsored by the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association and held at Shaarei Shomayim synagogue.

Non-Jews say "that Jews went to the camps like sheep and that Jews didn't fight, and that makes me livid. But if I stop the next 10 Jews I see on Bathurst Street and ask them about the Jewish contribution to the war effort, I will get a blank stare."

Pasternack gave an account of participation of Jews during World War II: Over 1.5 million served in the Allied Armed Forces (with another 75,000 giving another race for fear at being captured) — half a million fought for the United States and the same number for the Soviet Union, 42,000 for the French and the Free French, 75,000 for Great Britain, 150,000 to 180,000 for the Polish army and then for the Polish army in exile; 20 Jewish fighter pilots of the Polish Air Force were killed in the Battle of Britain.

Jews, Pasternack said, served with Montgomery's Eighth Army, in the Battle of Britain, in the Battle of the Atlantic, in the Middle East and behind German lines. Myer Levin sank the first Japanese battleship destroyed after Pearl Harbor.

In Canada, of a total Jewish population of 160,000 Jews, he said, 17,456 enlisted — a higher percentage than the national average, and they suffered a higher percentage of deaths and earned more awards for bravery than the national average.

Pasternack also praised the partisans, the resistance fighters of the Warsaw Ghetto and the survivors of the concentration camps, who, he said, should be praised just for being able to survive.

Arnold Friedman, president of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association, slammed all those who did not help Jews during the war, including occupied countries, the Allied nations, including Canada, and supposedly neutral countries like Portugal and Switzerland, "which preached neutrality and collaborated with robber barons to steal from us."

Memorial candles were lit by survivors and their families, many escorted by members of the General Wingate Branch of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada.

O Canada, Hatikvah and K'El Maleh Rachamim were recited by Shaarei Shomayim chazzan sheni Shlomo Sufrin, and Friedman recited Kaddish.

Second generation thanks parents for exemplary upbringing

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Hamilton's Holocaust Remembrance Committee honored the community's approximately 100 survivors at its annual Yom Hashoah commemoration held recently at Adas Israel Synagogue.

During introductory remarks by second generation committee members, the survivors were thanked for "the manner in which you have survived and the exemplary manner in which you have lived...for having raised us with feelings of respect for humankind, decency and kindness."

As their names were called, the honorees, seated among the 500 people in attendance, rose and stepped out into the aisles. A slowly moving line of second and third generation children and grandchildren of survivors formed on either side of the sanctuary, as each survivor was partnered with a child and presented with a yahrtzeit candle.

The evening also featured the Hamilton Children's Choir which performed a musical rendition of the poetry of child Holocaust survivor Inge Auerbacher.

In 1996 the choir's director, David Davis, came across Auerbacher's book, I am a Star in the local library, while searching for age-appropriate material that would enable his students to connect to the horrors of the Holocaust. He commissioned local composer Robert Rivers to set a selection of her poems to music as part of the choir's commemoration of the 50th anniversary of World War II.

Rivers plunged into the project with enthusiasm, attending Holocaust education workshops, renting videos and reading books on the subject and meeting with local survivor Nadia Rosa.

The premiere performance of Rivers' compositions took place at a local Anglican church last year. Auerbacher, accompanied by Rosa, flew from the United States for the occasion and Davis recalls preparing the children by saying, "Remember: The lady whose life you're singing about will be sitting in the audience." The two women, he recalls, were moved to tears, as was everybody in attendance that evening.

This was only the second public occasion at which the pieces were performed, and Jewish community members were visibly moved by the reverence and depth of feeling expressed by both the children and the accompanying musicians. An unexpected dramatic moment occurred when Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz rose from the audience before the beginning of the final movement to blow the shofar.

Winnipeg Jews add voice to call for justice

By MYRON LOVE
Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The underlying theme of this year's Holocaust Awareness Week (May 4 to 9) activities in Winnipeg was the need to keep pressure on the federal government to bring suspected Nazi war criminals living in Canada to justice before they die of old age.

In a presentation at Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Steve Shulman of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) cited the case of Antonis Kenstavicius, a member of a Lithuanian killing squad, as an example of what is transpiring.

Kenstavicius settled in British Columbia after the war and worked for the railroad. CJC first alerted the government about him in 1949, but it wasn't until last year that proceedings were brought against him. He died in January, at the age of 92, just as evidence was beginning to be entered against him.

The urgent need for Ottawa to prosecute war criminals in our midst was also emphasized by University of Manitoba law professor, Jack London, the day before at a Jewish community rally accompanying the traditional Holocaust Remembrance service at the Bnay Abraham Synagogue.

Both London and Shulman blame the lack of action not on anti-Semitism, but on legal delays, bureaucratic inertia and indifference.

"There is no fire in the belly," Shulman said. "There is no drive on this issue. How typically Canadian that it was on an American television show (60 Minutes) that a Canadian bureaucrat admitted for the first time that the government has done nothing about the issue for decades."

Canada's record in welcoming Nazi war criminals after the war while putting barriers in the way of Holocaust survivors was no different than that of stereotypical Nazi havens such as Argentina and Brazil, Shulman noted.

Anti-Semitism at the time was one factor in Canada's record, he pointed out, but of equal if not greater weight was the new post-war battle against communism. These Nazi-tainted newcomers were viewed as anti-communists rather than war criminals.

Week of activities

As well, Canada needed immigrants, Shulman pointed out. The economy was booming and there were large immigrant communities to welcome them.

Shulman praised the good intentions of Justice Minister Allan Rock, but urged Canadian Jewish organizations to keep up the pressure.

"As time goes by, there are fewer and fewer survivors to tell the story. Canada's history of inaction can only lead people who look back years from now to question how serious the Holocaust really was and lead to increasing support for Holocaust deniers."

Holocaust denial was the topic of Prof. Barney Sneiderman, also of the University of Manitoba Faculty of Law, who spoke last Tuesday at the Bnay Abraham Synagogue.

Holocaust Awareness Week concluded with B'nai Brith Canada's second annual Unto Every Person There is a Name program at the Manitoba Legislature, followed by the yearly service at the Holocaust memorial on the legislative grounds.

Sher wants prosecution of Nazi 'small fry'

By JOEL JACOBSON
Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Neal Sher wants the "small fry" prosecuted and deported.

The former head of the Office of Special Investigation (OSI) in the United States insists it took hundreds of thousands of "small frys" of Nazi Germany to make the Holocaust what it was. He is adamant that, "knowing they're in your midst, it is imperative to do something. There will never be perfect justice. But if we don't seek them out and have them deported, we are just giving Hitler a posthumous victory. That must never happen."

Sher spoke to more than 200 people at a Halifax Yom Hashoah gathering at Shaar Shalom Synagogue. Organized by the Atlantic Jewish Council, the event brought together federal and provincial politicians, local government officials including Halifax mayor Walter Fitzgerald, provincial judges and members of the Jewish and non-Jewish communities.

Retired as director of OSI since 1994, and now in private law practice in Washington, D.C., Sher listened to survivor Helena Jockel of Halifax tell her story of facing the trauma of the death camps.

"Every survivor has a story that boggles the mind," said Sher. "And they continue to tell those stories. What will happen 50 years from now when the survivors are gone? Will there be debates about whether six million died or was it gross exaggeration? As long as we face the possibility of Holocaust deniers, our work in hunting down Nazi war criminals is important — both in my country and in Canada."

He said cases are now being investigated in Canada. Positive statements are being made of an intent to move forward. "These cases educate and demonstrate the importance of calling to account the individuals who minimize the scope of the Holocaust, who challenge the credibility of survivors."

Sher reminded the audience there are horrible crimes and genocide occurring today but emphasized people can't lose sight of the fact that Hitler's war against the Jews was waged against a "defenceless people with no army, no state. How different world Jewry today might have been if Israel had existed in 1935 or if the British had allowed open immigration to Palestine," he said.

Jockel named several members of the Halifax community — Holocaust survivors who needed power and moral strength to last through interminable months and years in concentration camps. Then she described how one million fellow countrymen from Hungary were either moved to concentration camps or killed.

During the program, members of six community groups each lit candles and read 10 names of Holocaust victims. In conjunction with the theme of the evening, that 20 percent of the six million victims were under 15 years of age, those named were all between the ages of two and 15.

Similar commemorative ceremonies were held in Saint John, N.B. and in St. John's, Nfld. with a program also planned for Fredericton, N.B.

Moving tribute

Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Jewish community here commemorated Holocaust Remembrance Day on May 4 with a moving tribute to the six million Jews who lost their lives.

The two-hour ceremony sponsored by the Vancouver Holocaust Education Centre at Beth Israel Synagogue included a candlelighting ceremony, songs, poetry, prayers and speeches by survivors, children of survivors and participants in the March of the Living.

Among the highlights were a children's choir rendition of the Perry Ehrlich song Remember, author Bernard Pinsky's reading of excerpts from a book about his father's experiences in the Holocaust entitled My Father's Story, and Holocaust survivor Bronia Sonnenschein's account of her participation in the Canadian Jewish Congress' award-winning anti-racism outreach program in Idaho.

Cantor Steve Levin of Beth Israel chanted the K'El Maleh Rachamin and Rabbi Wilfred Solomon led the interdenominational congregation in the Kaddish, the Jewish prayer for the dead.

The ceremony concluded with locally based Yiddish vocalist Claire Osipov's rendition of the Partisan's Song and an impromptu version of Hatikvah.

The following day, the Yom Hashoah memorial service was held at Schara Tzedek Cemetery in New Westminster.

Rabbi speaks about 'heart of Jerusalem'

By BAILA LAZARUS
Jewish Bulletin of Vancouver

VANCOUVER — Security guards flanked the entrance to the Norman Rothstein Theatre of the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver keeping a close watch as the audience filed in to hear Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, Israel's Ashkenazi chief rabbi.

In an emotional speech to a full house on April 30, Rabbi Lau used anecdotes and quotes from the Bible to bring home the topic of the evening — Jerusalem: Centre of the Universe.

Rabbi Yisrael Lau

"Chapter 40 of Isaiah talks about the redemption of the Jewish people," said Rabbi Lau, "and what are the first four words? Dabru al lev Yerushalayim – Speak on the heart of Jerusalem."

Rabbi Lau said the words should be interpreted to mean Jerusalem as the heart of the people of Israel. "This is the command of the Almighty," he added.

He also suggested that Jerusalem holds a special place in Judaism because of the presence of the Western Wall, considered one of the holiest places in the Jewish world.

"The tears of the mothers and fathers from all generations, and the blood of the sons 30 years ago [during the Six-Day War] come from the same well," he said, his voice rising, "and they were [collected] on the stones of the Kotel [Western Wall] all together. You cannot separate the sacrifices of our sons from the tears and the prayers of our fathers and mothers from 2,000 years ago."

Rabbi Lau, 60, is the 37th generation of a family of rabbis. A Holocaust survivor, he was ordained in 1971 and led the congregation Ohr Torah in Tel Aviv. He then acted as rabbi of Northern Tel Aviv, chief rabbi of Netanya, chief rabbi of Tel Aviv-Jaffa and in 1993, was elected to the position of Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel.

The rabbi's visit was sponsored by the Lohn Foundation and Lubavitch B.C., to come to British Columbia to speak at week-long Passover activities at Whistler. He spoke at the Jewish Community Centre as part of Lubavitch's Ethics and Torah series.

In his closing remarks, he talked about Jerusalem as a spiritual centre, not only for Jews but for other religions as well. He told of a discussion he had with a Muslim leader: "I said, 'Great leader do you know how many times the word Yerushalayim appears in the Old Testament?' He said, 'How many?' I said, 'Five hundred and eighty-seven times. And do you know how many times the word Zion is mentioned? One hundred and fifty-one times. In your holy book, the Koran, the fundamental book of Islam, how many times does it say Yerushalayim? I will tell you because it's much easier to remember. Zero! Not even once.'"

Rabbi Lau dismissed the notion that Jerusalem should be considered a holy city for Islam because "when a Muslim prays, he falls on earth to pray. Where does he face? If he is in Jerusalem, he shows his back to the holy mountain, to the mosque, because he has to face Saudi Arabia, Mecca," he said.

"We don't ask [Muslims] to give up Mecca or Medina. We don't ask the Christian world to give up the Vatican," Rabbi Lau concluded. "Don't ask us to give up Yerushalayim."

The chief rabbi's remarks struck a resonant chord with many in the audience, who rose afterward for a standing ovation.

"It's the right speech at the right time," said Harry Nortman, "because now Jerusalem is the topic of the Jewish people. It's touching to every Jew."

But not everyone was as impressed. Rabbi David Mivasair of Vancouver's Or Shalom Synagogue found many things missing from the address.

Not everyone was impressed

"I'm very impressed with his depth and his eloquence as a speaker," said Rabbi Mivasair. "I'm really disappointed that he didn't address more explicitly the many critically pressing issues surrounding the relationship between Jews living in Jerusalem today and between the Jews and the Palestinians for whom that city is home. I'm very disappointed that he didn't deal with current reality."

Naomi Ehren-Lis was also disappointed that no time was allowed for audience questions. "He speaks about Jerusalem as a heart," she said, "but a heart is open and welcoming and the audience wasn't given a chance to participate at all."

Rabbi Lau left the building immediately after his speech to catch a plane to New York.

Memoir tells story of early Cape Breton Jews

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the early part of the century, our parents sailed to this country from many parts of Europe, and their history is interwoven with Canada. Now, along comes a book about Whitney Pier, Cape Breton Island, one of the most fascinating settlements of early Jewish life.

The thriving Jewish community of Cape Breton, once as large as 2,500, is down to 200 (about the same as in 1901) and Commercial Street in Glace Bay, once the home of many Jewish merchants, looks like an abandoned Hollywood movie set.

That Glace Bay community once consisted of 800 Jews (110 families) and 79 of its young men enlisted in World War II , a participation rate of 20 percent

Now, its oldest clothing store, opened in the early 1900s by his grandfather, is just closing, and this is sad news for Dr. Lawrence I.

Lawrence Gaum

Gaum, 59, a Toronto oral surgeon who has written and printed, at his own expense, From Belarus to Cape Breton and Beyond.

It is a memoir not only of the Jewish immigrants from Eastern Europe who were attracted to the coal mines and steel plants of Cape Breton (some Jews worked in the coal mines), but also of a personal odyssey by the Gaum family in 1994 to the villages of Kozharnhorodok, Lininets, Lachiva, Krasna Volya and Timkovitz in Belarus, where their ancestors lived. The indexing, history, maps and 300 family photos make it a genealogical treasure.

In unvarnished prose, (the story of an alcoholic cousin is included) Gaum tells about his great grandfather, Isaac Jacob, "the tall Zeida" who could not speak English but one day stopped the driver of a hearse in Sydney and, in Yiddish, asked to be taken to his daughter's home. The driver recognized the familiar figure and took him there. It was the same "Zeida" who, by himself, lifted 300-pound barrels of empty bottles, which he collected, onto a wagon for delivery.

A blacksmith by trade , he made such good food choppers in Belarus that Gaum's wife, Hope, is still using one in Toronto at least 100 years later.

Gaum discovered that his grandfather, Shaiya (Sam) Latucha, because of his lack of English, had led the immigration officer to put his name down as Gaum because he had a brother-in-law named Gam in Cape Breton, where he was heading.

Successful grocery merchant

As a boy, Gaum wrote his family's history on slips of paper carried around in old issue of the Reader's Digest. His handsome 277-page computer-produced volume includes a photograph of relatives with the late Menachem Begin when he was prime minister of Israel.

The book, a five-year project by Gaum, a Jewish Genealogical Society member, is in the reference section of the North York Central Library.

Though he landed without his own name, grandfather Shaiya did find many relatives in Cape Breton. His descendants include retired Senator Jack Marshall, and Elliot Marshall of Glace Bay, one of 11 children, operator of the about-to-be closed S.E Marshall Clothing store, who is moving to Ottawa to be near his daughter.

Elliot Marshall was one of eight Jewish boys on the 13-member Glace Bay English Ruby Football team and practices were always cancelled for the High Holy Days.

Gaum recalls being told that his grandfather, a short but heavily muscled man, beat up a drunk who, when asked to pay 10 cents for it, squashed a bag of tomatoes instead. He thought the price was too high. Only by carrying the drunk away from Shaiya's wrath did his father, Maurice, and his uncle, Benny, save the man from further injury.

It was Gaum's father who helped set up his office as a 22-year-old dentist in Corner Brook, Nfld. When, 30 years later, Gaum went back to Corner Brook at the invitation of the Newfoundland Dental Society, he found, like Geraldine Page in the movie A Trip to Bountiful, that you can't go home again.

Gaum's uncle, Benny, a professional boxer in his early days, became a successful grocery merchant, and wrote political speeches for both the Conservative and Liberal candidates in Sydney on the side.

Benny caught a teenager stealing canned goods but listened to the boy's plea and did not report him to police. The boy grew up to become a famous psychiatrist in the United States and dropped into Benny's store on visits.

Gaum's grandmother, Fratka, an observant woman, had her own style of computer. When she sold on credit to a Mrs. Black, she put a slip under a box of chocolates (for black) with pencil marks crossed off to indicate she still owed $2.

She was up at 6 a.m. every day, baking bread and bagels, before working in the store, now boarded up. When Fratka died at 92, she couldn't be buried beside her husband, father and son, because the ground was too frozen. Another plot had to be found in the Jewish cemetery.

When Fratka traveled to Canada in steerage with her sons, Benny, 5 and Maruice, 3, she had a total of $1.20.

Gaum's grandfather, Shaiya, didn't drive a car after running a Model-T Ford into a wall. In his later years, despite a heart condition, he took his wife's freshly-baked bread by street car to his daughter Sarah (Gaum's mother) in Sydney, walking the last mile and one-half.

Besides running their store, Maurice and Sarah Gaum raised a family of four sons: the author and three brothers, Errol, a dental surgeon in Halifax; Sanford, of California, a former dental surgeon, now in real estate; and Jack, a lawyer and director of terminals at Pearson Airport.

Halifax mayor 'enlightened' by visit to Israel

By JOEL JACOBSON
Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Halifax mayor Walter Fitzgerald couldn't find enough adjectives to describe a recent trip to Israel.

"Intensive. Overwhelming. Emotional. Informative. Educational. Enlightening. Unbelievable. It was all of those and more," said the mayor, who attended the 17th Jerusalem Conference for Mayors, the only Canadian of 60 mayors from 42 countries at the six-day combination of meetings and tours.

The conference was sponsored by the U.S. Conference of Mayors and the American Jewish Congress and was held with the cooperation and support of the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

"I was so impressed with the people, with their determination to make Israel a peaceful country and to make it work," said Fitzgerald. "It was the best trip I've ever attended. We saw history, stayed at a kibbutz, visited the tomb of Christ. At times I just couldn't believe I was there."

With his wife, Linda, the mayor had a pre-conference tour set up by Jon Goldberg, executive director of the Atlantic Jewish Council. The Fitzgeralds visited Metulla where they met Mayor Yossi Goldberg and toured Canada Centre. A former hockey player at Dalhousie University in Halifax, the 60-year-old mayor was offered skates to test the ice but declined.

Prior to the conference, the couple also met officials of ZIM Lines, one of the major shipping companies using the port of Halifax. "We had lunch with them and the mayor of Haifa, and discussed the importance of ZIM to Halifax.

"They complained of high prices but we talked more of Halifax as an international port."

Fitzgerald and the other mayors met Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"I presented him with a pewter business card holder with an engraving of Halifax City Hall. It was a quick 30-second opportunity to say hello and bring greetings," said Fitzgerald. "He was supposed to stay with our group for about 10 minutes but he spent 45 minutes chatting with various people."

Linda Fitzgerald went on the trip "with some apprehension because of news reports but I felt very safe at all times. Even while we were there, we'd see reports on CNN and wonder if we were in the same place."

A Grade 1 teacher in Halifax, Linda Fitzgerald was impressed with the passion of the people, "the joy they seem to have and their resourcefulness. I was fascinated by life on the kibbutz, by the lifestyle and the quality of life the people maintain.

"I was amazed that there is a fund, and I don't know if this is the same on all kibbutzim, that fully pays for the children to attend university after their army service. It was like an extended family as they work toward the common good."

The Fitzgeralds were entertained one evening by former Halifax resident Linda Epstein who has been working in Israel for more than 20 years. Her brother, Howard, an NDP candidate in the federal election, is a member of Fitzgerald's Halifax City Council.

"It was a wonderful experience," said the mayor. "We saw so much of the country, the Golan Heights, Masada, Jerusalem, the place where Christ was supposedly crucified, the Western Wall, the Dead Sea, and the Holocaust Museum. I think Masada and the Holocaust Museum were the most emotional for me. The museum will never leave me."

"I think of Halifax at 250 years old (in 1999) and then realize I was in a place that is 3,000 years old."

A dream come true

By JOEL JACOBSON
Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Ben Lipkus' dying wish has come true.

The Glace Bay, N.S., furniture store operator passed away last Rosh Hashanah, at 79 years of age. In his last few months, he decided to donate an ambulance to Israel through Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel, which provides health care supplies and emergency equipment.

"His wish has been granted," said Sidney Lipkus, Ben's son, who is still running the family business. "My mother was all for it. And we have dedicated the ambulance to my father and to his and my mother's late parents."

The ambulance, bought in Pennsylvania by the Montreal-based Magen David organization, will arrive in Glace Bay May 18 for dedication and then be shipped to Montreal for transfer to Israel.

"We probably donate about eight ambulances a year from Canada," said Shirley Moscovitch of the Magen David office. "But this is the first ever from Atlantic Canada."

She said dedication plaques will be placed on the driver and passenger doors. The driver's door will be dedicated to Ben Lipkus and his parents, Beinus and Fanny Lipkus. The other door will display a plaque naming Ben Lipkus and Shalom and Elka Cohen, parents of Rachel Lipkus.

Sidney Lipkus said his father, born in Sydney Mines, followed his father into the furniture business. "My grandfather came from Russia and was a pedlar originally. He opened the furniture store and had his four sons involved with him. Now I'm carrying on the family tradition."

He said his parents (his mother Rachel was born in Glace Bay) celebrated their 50th wedding anniversary Aug. 11, about a month before Ben passed away.

They had two sons. Barry lives in Toronto.

"One other wish my father had was that Barry would say Kaddish as often as possible. He knew I couldn't, because it is difficult to get daily minyanim [at Glace Bay's Orthodox Sons of Israel Synagogue]. I go to Sydney each weekend when they have services. But Barry is living in Toronto and has been able to attend a daily minyan there. We're trying to grant my father's every wish."

Winnipeggers relax as river crests

By MATT BELLAN
Jewish Post & News

WINNIPEG — The Red River has crested and most people are now breathing a sigh of relief.

What local media called the "flood of the century" claimed a few houses just to the southeast of the city but the rest of us are high and dry.

Red River Flood

The crisis isn't over quite yet though. The water levels will remain high for another two to four weeks and the dikes have to be patrolled frequently to check for leaks. Recently, a busload of Grade 9, 10 and 11 students from Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate were bussed to nearby Scotia Street in answer to an emergency call to join volunteers, other students and army personnel in plugging a serious leak in the dikes.

While the city's Jewish neighborhoods in the North and South Ends never really faced the prospects of serious flooding, Jewish organizations did draw up emergency plans.

Evelyn Hecht, the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council's (WJCC) community relations director, confirmed that the community was ready to open up the (YMHA Jewish Community Centre) building to help give emergency shelter to Winnipeggers evacuated from homes during the flood. "It depends on what the need will be." WJCC staff also made calls earlier this month to "people we know in Grand Forks."

The Winnipeggers wanted to know how the Jewish community here could help Jewish residents of that Red River-flooded city.

"We received a tremendous amount of support and interest from national Jewish organizations," she added. "The Council of Jewish Federations in New York, for example, called and asked what they could do. They agreed to post information on their Web site updating our situation."

Canadian Jewish Congress has thrown its support behind an initiative to aid victims in the flood-ravaged regions.

CJC national president Goldie Hershon has issued a communique to regional offices urging Canadian Jewry to show compassion for fellow citizens stricken by the flood.

Flood relief cheques can be made out to the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council General Flood Relief Effort), 370 Hargrave St., Winnipeg, R3B 2K1.

Peace talks prospects gloomy on Independence Day

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel held its 49th Independence Day celebrations amid an unpromising climate for restarting Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

The state ceremony at Jerusalem's Mount Herzl opened with the theme, 100 years of Zionism, to commemorate the century that has passed since the first session of the Zionist Congress was held in Basel, Switzerland, to set out the goals of the Zionist movement.

The start of Independence Day officially marked the end of Israel's Memorial Day, which commemorated the 18,538 men and women who fell in defence of the state since the 1948 War of Independence. The total included 328 people who died during the past year.

For the first time, this year's Memorial Day observances recalled civilians killed in terrorist attacks.

As a siren brought the country to a standstill in memory of the fallen, Israeli leaders and military officers stressed that a strong Israel was essential for the country's future.

"We are moving surely, step by step, toward an era of acceptance by our neighbors of Israel's existence," Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said at the main state memorial ceremony at the Mount Herzl military cemetery.

He said that a strong Israeli army was "the true basis for the hope of peace."

Meanwhile, U.S. Middle East envoy Dennis Ross continued efforts to revive the stalled Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

His mission to the region, which began last week and was his second in a month, was to be extended by several days, American officials said.

Ross, who held a series of separate meetings last week with Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat, is encountering hardened positions on both sides.

Israeli-Palestinian contacts all but stopped in mid-March, when Israel started construction of a new Jewish neighborhood at Har Choma in southeastern Jerusalem.

The Palestinians have been calling for a halt to the project, and to settlement expansion, as a precondition for restarting negotiations.

Israel also has a precondition — the resumption of intelligence-sharing.

Less than optimistic about immediately finding a formula to bring the two sides back to the table, Ross said that it could take weeks before Israeli-Palestinian negotiations resume.

Netanyahu said he believed there were still many hurdles to be overcome before the talks would get back on track.

"They cannot expect us to make all the concessions, while they make none," Netanyahu told Israel Radio, adding that it was too early to decide whether Ross' shuttle was a success or failure.

Netanyahu also discussed Israeli-Syrian negotiations, which have been stalled since March 1996, saying that Washington would play a key role in restarting the talks.

The prime minister said that there had been recent contacts in which Damascus signaled interest in renewing the talks, but added that it was too soon to judge Syria's seriousness.

Senior Israeli army officers warned that if the peace option failed to break the deadlock over the future of the Golan Heights, Damascus could still consider the war option.

Syrian words and actions are "pointing to the possibility of Syria's using force to achieve political aims if the path of peace does not succeed," Israel Defence Force chief of staff Lt. Gen. Amnon Shahak told Army Radio.

Israel imposed a closure on the West Bank and Gaza Strip, when Memorial Day began, as a precaution against terrorist attacks.

The closure was to be lifted after Independence Day ended.

Arab land dealer found murdered

By JON IMMANUEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — A Jerusalem Arab land dealer was found dead last week in Ramallah from a blow to the back of the head, one week after Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat ordered his security forces to prevent land sales to Jews.

The death of Farid Bashiti, 70, who had worked as a real estate agent for 30 years, came three days after PA Justice Minister Freih Abu Medein said publicly that the death penalty would be demanded in PA courts for anybody who sold land to Jews, since the Har Choma project showed that Israel used land purchases to reinforce its claims to political sovereignty over land.

Bashiti was considered to have intimate dealings with the Israel Lands Administration.

The PA-appointed mufti of Jerusalem, Akrime Sabri, said during a sermon in Al-Aksa Mosque, shortly after the body was discovered, that Bashiti would be denied a Muslim burial. According to Islamic law, a Muslim who sells land to a non-believer in Jerusalem is considered an infidel, he said.

Recently, the house of the Armenian patriarchate on the Mount of Olives sold to an American Jewish millionaire was transferred to the Mercaz Harav Kook Yeshivah.

Arafat held a cabinet meeting in Ramallah on May 2 in which he called for action to be taken to prevent land sales by Arabs to Jews. The cabinet placed the burden of preventing such sales directly on the security agencies and the Justice Ministry, which later pronounced the death penalty.

However, the main issue for the PA now is land sales within the municipal boundaries of Jerusalem, and most landowners in Jerusalem live under Israeli authority. They thus cannot be tried by the PA, and the PA security agencies have no legal access to them.

Bashiti was apparently spirited out of Jerusalem. According to the Israel Police, he was kidnapped from the Ambassador Hotel in eastern Jerusalem. However, WAFA, the Palestinian news agency, quoted a receptionist as saying he left the hotel arm-in-arm with a young woman.

There is no direct evidence yet to imply that the PA was involved.

However, the Palestinian Preventive Security Service (PSS), headed by Col. Jibril Rajoub, has frequently operated in Jerusalem, sometimes abducting wanted suspects to Jericho.

Bashiti was found with his hands behind his back. His body was taken by the Israel Police for an autopsy.

Holocaust survivors could benefit from U.S. report

By MATTHEW DORF
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Holocaust survivors stand to benefit as a result of a U.S. study on the fate of Nazi gold.

Analysis

With more than 200 pages that leave no Allied, Axis or neutral power untouched, the United States, in releasing the report recently, said it would seek to give tens of millions of dollars in World War II-era German gold to survivors.

The gold, stored in the Bank of England and the Federal Reserve Bank in New York, is the remnant of Nazi wartime plunder recovered by the Allies. Holocaust victims could see millions more if the United States reopens negotiations with Switzerland and other nations over decades-old agreements that misrepresented the amount of money the Nazis looted and sold to neutral nations to finance their war effort.

Holocaust survivors could obtain additional reparations as a result of new inquiries into a chapter of history that had not so long ago been thought closed.

Earlier this year, bowing to international pressure from international Jewish groups, led by the World Jewish Congress (WJC), the Swiss government established two funds to provide needy Holocaust survivors with millions of dollars.

The release of the U.S. study, U.S. and Allied Efforts to Recover and Restore Gold and Other Assets Stolen or Hidden by Germany During World War II, caps a seven-month interagency review, which was overseen by U.S. Undersecretary of Commerce Stuart Eizenstat.

The report is as unique for its research of more than 15 million documents as it is for its specificity.

Among the key findings:

- Neutral countries "ignored repeated Allied entreaties to end their dealings with Nazi Germany." Their trade "with the Third Reich had the clear effect of supporting and prolonging Nazi Germany's capacity to wage war."
- Switzerland prolonged the war and the murder of Jews by supporting Germany's "capacity to wage war."
- The U.S. secretaries of state and treasury lied to Congress after the war about the amount of Nazi gold in European banks.
- The "inflexibility" of the Swiss banks "made it extremely difficult for surviving family members of Nazi victims to successfully file claims to secure bank records."
- There is no evidence that Switzerland or other countries, including the United States, knowingly accepted the gold of Holocaust victims.
- Congress and U.S. state governments should consider subpoenaing private records to determine whether there are unclaimed assets of Holocaust victims in American banks.

The Eizenstat report grew out of questions and accusations involving a single country — Switzerland.

As wartime documents were declassified, Switzerland found itself besieged by international criticism over allegations about its wartime role.

It was charged with hoarding the wealth of Holocaust victims while helping to finance the Nazi war effort by purchasing vast sums of looted Nazi gold.

But as researchers combed through thousands of documents in the archives of the United States and European countries, additional questions surfaced regarding other countries' purchases of Nazi gold.

In addition, some of the documents raised the question of whether the Allies themselves, including the United States, had been aggressive enough in locating and distributing Nazi gold.

WJC praises document

In the wake of these questions, the State Department announced last October that it would launch an intensive review into how the Allies identified and distributed Nazi gold plundered during the war.

The importance of the findings to Jews was underscored by the fact that Eizenstat briefed some two dozen Jewish organizational officials, a few hours before the report was made public.

WJC officials, who worked closely with Eizenstat's researchers, hailed the report as "an historical document."

In Israel, Jewish Agency for Israel chair Avraham Burg, who has been closely involved in restitution efforts, viewed the Eizenstat report as a call to action.

"The time for batting accusations of relative responsibility is well past," Burg said in a statement. "Now is the hour for immediate action by all governments" that received post-war transfers of looted gold.

How the money is distributed is certain to be the subject of much debate over the next few months. Survivors' groups want to see all the compensation turned over to needy survivors.

Other Jewish groups and Eizenstat are seeking to set up an endowed fund and draw payments in part from the interest generated by the fund.

At the briefing with Jewish organizational officials, Eizenstat, who serves as the U.S. special envoy for restitution issues and is slated for a senior post at the State Department, blamed the United States for "failing" Holocaust victims "in the areas of restitution and compensation.

"Ultimately, the United States, its Allies and the neutrals will not be judged so much by our actions or inactions 50 years ago," Eizenstat said, "but by what we do today."

Eizenstat called for the immediate release of a "substantial portion" of the $70 million (US) in gold still to be distributed from the Tripartite Commission.

But Eizenstat and the report stopped short of calling for a renegotiation of the post-World War II agreement that divided the Nazi regime's plunder.

The Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold, established in September 1946 by the United States, Britain and France, was charged with the distribution of so-called monetary gold looted by the Nazis from the central banks of those European countries they had overrun.

Recently declassified documents indicated that the Tripartite Commission's distributions also may have included privately owned, or non-monetary, gold — some of which may have come from wedding bands and tooth fillings stripped from Jews on their way to the death camps.

The Swiss government contributed some $58 million in gold to the gold pool administered by the Tripartite Commission under the terms of the so-called 1946 Washington Agreement.

According to Eizenstat's report, the Swiss held far more looted Nazi gold than it turned over to the commission — an amount estimated at between $185 million and $289 million at the end of the war.

An additional $120 million was also estimated to be held for other countries by the Swiss central bank.

The Tripartite Commission distributed most of the gold in the pool during the 1940s and 1950s. The claimant countries receiving the distributions were: Albania, Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Poland and the former Yugoslavia.

But in February, the United States, Britain and France agreed to halt distribution of the remaining $70 million while officials investigated whether some of it came from Holocaust victims.

In his assessment of the report, Eizenstat saved his harshest criticism for Switzerland and other neutral countries.

"The report makes painfully clear that neutral countries — Argentina, Portugal, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and until the last three months of the war, Turkey — were slow to recognize and to acknowledge that this was not just another European war," he said.

"Their cooperation was motivated in part by fear of invasion. It was also motivated in part by Nazi sympathies in some countries and by a desire for profit in all."

Contributing to this report were JTA foreign editor Mitchell Danow in New York, and correspondents Fredy Rom in Zurich and Ruth Gruber in Washington.

"A FULL VALUE RESORT ~ NO FINER FAMILY VACATION"

Swiss Jews face ghosts of World War II

Last December, the outgoing president of Switzerland and the current minister of economics, Jean-Pascal Delamuraz, claimed in a fiery speech that Jewish groups were trying to "blackmail" Switzerland into creating a special fund for Holocaust survivors. He later apologized for this remark, but did not withdraw his assertion that foreign powers were using the controversy to destroy Switzerland as a financial centre.

At the same time, Jewish community centres and Jewish leaders were inundated with hundreds of thinly veiled anti-Semitic letters dredging up ancient canards and taking Jews to task for "insulting" and "threatening" Switzerland with an economic boycott. And in a reflection of this mood, the letters-to-the-editor columns of Swiss newspapers were filled with ambiguous missives.

"What was done to the Jews is indescribable and unforgivable," wrote one man, referring to the Holocaust, in a typical letter. "But does that give Jewish organizations the right to accuse, insult and threaten Switzerland as a whole?"

Rolf Bloch, president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Switzerland, says this outpouring of bile in the Swiss press constitutes the gravest upsurge of overt anti-Semitism since the war.

"The old cliches are coming up again," he said in an interview at the annual meeting of the federation held at the Hilton Hotel last week.

Werner Rom, president of the community in Zurich, says that recent events have had the effect of lowering the threshold of explicit anti-Semitism. "A lot of people have been traumatized," he conceded.

Francois Loeb, the sole Jewish member of the federal parliament in Bern, says he has received a plethora of signed anti-Semitic letters of late, whereas in the past, he got very few.

Saly Fromer, a 75-year-old retired banker who lived through the war in Basel, attributes the upswing in anti-Semitism to inaccurate reports in the American press that Switzerland collaborated with Nazi Germany. "That's wrong," he declared. Switzerland made mistakes, but it was not pro-Nazi.

Although Jewish leaders here are clearly disheartened by the attacks on their community, they are at pains to emphasize that the picture is anything but uniformly grim.

"We have gotten many letters of support," said Bloch, one of Switzerland's leading chocolate manufacturers. "And members of the federal government have spoken against anti-Semitism."

"There have been a lot of positive reactions, too, letters of regret and sympathy," added Rom.

In Bern, the federal capital, high school students recently raised $80,000 for Holocaust survivors, while thousands of people gathered at Parliament Square for a silent vigil to commemorate the victims of the Shoah, Loeb said.

Bloch acknowledged that the Jewish community is caught between its loyalty to Switzerland and the reasonable demands of overseas Jewish organizations for a full accounting of Switzerland's behavior during the war.

"We want truth, justice and transparency," he explained. "But we have to feel sympathy for Swiss people who are unjustly accused in a collective way."

Block and other Jewish leaders are satisfied with Switzerland's efforts to confront its dark past.

- A commission, headed by Paul Volcker, is investigating the issue of dormant bank accounts, and a report is expected by the summer of 1998.
- A panel of Swiss and international historians is studying Switzerland's wartime conduct. Reports will be issued periodically.
- A $265-million humanitarian fund for needy Holocaust survivors has been set up by Swiss banks and private companies.
- A $5-billion foundation designed to assist victims of poverty and oppression, including Holocaust survivors, has been announced.

Sheldon Kirshner is in Switzerland at the invitation of the Swiss tourist board.

This holiday belongs to all Jews

By BENJAMIN NETANYAHU

Message from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to the Jewish communities of the Diaspora on the occasion of Israel's 49th Independence Day, May 5757-Iyar 1997.

On Israel's 49th Independence Day, I extend warm greetings from Jerusalem, Israel's eternal capital, to the Jewish communities throughout the world.

Yom Ha'atzmaut

Our Independence Day belongs not only to Israelis, but to all Jews. It celebrates the rebirth of the Jewish people, it pays tribute to a bond between a people and its land unparalleled in human history, and it gives us all a sense of unity and oneness, a feeling of responsibility for each other.

We must nurture this feeling, for on the fundamental issues we agree. First and foremost, we all want peace. From that moment 49 years ago, when David Ben-Gurion read our declaration of independence in a modest museum building in Tel Aviv, our hand has been stretched out in peace to our neighbors. In fact, the Zionist commitment to peace dates back to the time Theodor Herzl first conceived the idea of a Jewish state a century ago.

Today, there are few sacrifices and concessions Israel is unwilling to make to achieve peace. But there is a fundamental requirement all Israelis feel must be satisfied: security.

This should have been self-evident. The very definition of peace includes the absence of violence and war. Terrorism and threats of violence are incompatible with the peace process.

Yet there are many in the world community who expect Israel to withdraw from areas that are the cradle of Jewish civilization, to relinquish control over strategic assets, and to leave itself vulnerable to attack despite the absence of any credible assurance of security. This will not do. To treat the matter of security lightly is to abdicate our responsibilities as a government. Only if Israelis and Jews everywhere remain united in demanding that security be an integral, indispensable component of the peace process, can we achieve real peace for ourselves and for all the peoples of the region.

I know that for many of you the faith in Jewish unity has been shaken by the proposed conversion law which recently passed a first reading in the Knesset.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Although the bill intends to do more than turn current practice in Israel into law, and although it ensures continued recognition by Israel of Reform and Conservative conversions performed abroad, I understand the anxiety and anguish it has caused. Any hint of legally sanctioned inequality among Jews due to religious affiliation is intolerable.

I want to assure you that I shall do everything in my power to reach a solution to this painful problem. The struggle against assimilation and alienation is far too crucial to be deflected by internal bickering over the legitimacy of conversions to Judaism. Our energies will be far better spent if we focus on Jewish education and the inculcation of Jewish values and traditions in our young.

I believe we must never view the bond between Israel and the Diaspora as anything less than vital, nor can we afford to let anything loosen this bond. It is what gives the Jewish people strength in the present and confidence in the future. But as we mark 100 years of modern Zionism and enter Israel's 50th year we must not lose sight of the purpose of Zionism: the ingathering of the Jewish people in the Jewish state.

With Israel's economy developing at an extraordinary pace and with its standard of living approaching that of the most advanced nations, there is every reason for Jews everywhere to consider aliyah. Our goal is to have a majority of the Jewish people living in Israel by the time we celebrate the state's 60th anniversary.

I believe we can achieve this goal and every other goal we set for ourselves if we remember that regardless of differences of opinions, beliefs and affiliations we are one people, united forever by faith, history and a shared destiny.

Rebirth of Jewish state is a true success story

By EZER WEIZMAN

President Ezer Weizman's Independence Day Message to Jewish communities abroad, 5757-1997.

This Independence Day marks the beginning of the 50th anniversary of our being a free and sovereign nation in our own land. The re-establishment of the Jewish state in its homeland is a success story unparalleled in the annals of history. Israel at the end of its first jubilee is a country which looks ahead in hope. In various fields of creativity we are among the world's best.

This bright side of our lives encourages us and must be remembered when we come to face with sorrow and bereavement, the result of extremist elements. The road to peace is not an easy one. It is full of dangers and obstacles, but we are determined to continue along it, in the knowledge that it will lead to a better and more secure future for our children and grandchildren.

The stronger we are and the greater the number of our inhabitants, the easier it will be to achieve our aims. I, once again, call upon you, our brothers and sisters, in the Diaspora to send your children here to breathe the atmosphere of a free nation and to contribute their knowledge and expertise. Together we will make Israel more and more attractive to all Jews and create the largest Jewish centre. Together we will be able to advance even further Israel's scientific and cultural development and deepen our understanding of our ancient Jewish culture.

The Week in Israel

May 5

• An Israeli businessman, Nahum Manbar was indicted in a Tel Aviv court on charges of selling Iran equipment for manufacturing chemical weapons. If convicted, he faces the possibility of life imprisonment.

• Israel's new ambassador to Jordan, Oded Eran, presented his credentials to Jordan's foreign minister.

May 6

• The head of Hamas' political wing, Mohammed Abu Marzook, vowed to continue his struggle against Israel, but said he would no longer target Israeli civilians for terrorist attacks. Marzook spoke to reporters in Amman a day after the United States deported him to Jordan.

May 7

• Israeli air force planes attacked Hezbollah targets in Lebanon for the second straight day.

• Several members of the inner security Cabinet criticized Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai for the destruction earlier in the week of illegally built structures near Nablus. Some members of the cabinet have threatened to quit the coalition if a policy more supportive of settlements is not implemented.

May 8

• Palestinian Authority officials denounced the Armenian archbishop for selling his home on Mount Olives to a Jew. The building had been purchased through a company representing U.S. developer Irving Moskowitz.

• A report in the media said some of the missing assets of Holocaust victims may be in banks in Israel. A professor at Bar-Ilan University wrote in Ha'aretz that German Jews deposited huge sums in the banks before World War II and that their accounts had been frozen by British authorities.

May 9

• Preparations underway for Yom Hazikaron were to officially commence Saturday night. Ceremonies across the country were planned to pay tribute to the 18,538 men and women who have died in defence of the country since 1949.

Peres, Barak to meet soon

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Labor leader Shimon Peres and his would-be successor, MK Ehud Barak, may meet in an effort to defuse a quarrel which threatened to overshadow the party convention this week.

Barak phoned Peres last Saturday, after Peres had indicated that he might not attend the convention because of what he termed Barak's "dictatorial outlook and steamroller tactics."

Barak suggested they meet that night. Peres, however, replied that it would be unseemly to talk politics on the eve of Remembrance Day.

The acrimony in Labor grew to such proportions, prior to the phone call Barak made to Peres, that one of Barak's chief boosters, MK Haggai Merom, suggested that the entire convention be put off till after the June 3 leadership primary.

In a related development, leadership candidate MK Yossi Beilin also threatened to boycott the proceedings, charging that Barak refuses to let other candidates have the floor.

Beilin attacked Barak, saying that "someone unwilling to even consider an honorary title for Labor's unique statesman shows a great deal about his own character and unfortunately what he shows is highly unflattering."

Beilin said that he would boycott the convention if all four candidates for the party leadership are not allowed to address the delegates at the close of the convention. Barak's supporters want him to be the sole closing speaker.

Peres returned to Israel last week from a trip to the United States and immediately conferred in his home with a number of leading supporters, including party Secretary-General Nissim Zvilli, MKs Dalia Itzik and Rafi Elul (who have pledged their support in the primary to Barak) and Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg.

They discussed the Labor steering committee's decision not to put the proposal that Peres be appointed party president on the convention's agenda. Zvilli said he feels he can overturn the committee's decision with the support of 10 percent of the 3,700 delegates.

Peres, however, indicated to his supporters that he might not show up for the convention because "a new party is being created here, not the one which I know. The contention here is not about whether or not I will be party president but whether this party will remain at all democratic or will become a dictatorship in which everything revolves around the say-so of a single man. What is at stake is the soul of this party."

Meanwhile, the party's Jerusalem branch held its own convention last week. The main attraction was Likud MK Ze'ev Begin, invited to put forth his anti-Oslo views in an ideological debate.

The standing ovation he received did not prevent Begin from launching a stinging attack on Labor for "being a captive of its own Oslo conception, despite the fact that it is patently clear that this illusory process will not bring peace...The Palestinian covenant remains unamended and Labor fell into Arafat's trap...

"The idea that terror could be controlled by terrorists was thoroughly discredited, as was the notion that there can be overwhelming common interests between Israel and the PA...

"What we have is a process which defines progress as Israeli withdrawal. Israel's role is to give and the Arabs need only take. Labor sought a deal at any price and brought us a deal in which we will all pay a heavy price."

Israel's state comptroller finds ethical breaches

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Issuing her annual report on government activity, Israel's state comptroller said last week that she had found numerous instances of breaches of ethics in the public service.

The report, which covered the end of the Labor-led government and beginning of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud-led coalition, recommended that the attorney general investigate at least three cases of suspected criminal activities.

Miriam Ben Porat said she considered the 1,100 page report "one of the most serious" she had ever prepared.

The report comes on the heels of the Bar-On affair, a political scandal surrounding the short-lived appointment of an attorney general who stepped down in the wake of sharp criticism about his lack of experience.

Among the report's findings were a long list of political appointments that Porat said failed to meet required standards.

"It is natural that a new government would want to appoint people who share its views," Ben Porat said. "But unfortunately the drive to garner power sometimes pushed individuals to try to circumvent proper procedures and the law."

The report cited the appointment of a legal adviser to the prime minister's office, who was later forced to step down because he lacked the required experience.

In another case, the deputy housing minister promised projects to a contractor on condition that a Likud activist, who did not have the requisite experience, be made a deputy director of the company.

The report pointed to conflicts of interest in the disbursement of public funds, when members of organizations seeking such funds also sat on the ministerial committees which allocated them.

The state comptroller also criticized the lack of follow-up to ensure that funds distributed to organizations were used for their intended purpose.

On a separate issue, she raised grave concerns regarding the Israeli army's preparedness for war. Reserve combat soldiers do not receive adequate training, and there is no follow-up assessment of their training, the report said.

The report said that the army's wartime emergency stores were low, that armored vehicles were found to be flawed and that ammunition had expired.

Some 2 million citizens were still without proper gas masks, which must be supplied by the army, the report said.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai said in response that he was aware of the problems and hoped that the defence establishment would be given the necessary resources to correct them.

On another matter, Ben Porat said she had not yet decided whether to investigate the role of former Israel Defence Force chief of staff Ehud Barak in a November 1992 military accident.

Five soldiers were killed when a live missile prematurely fired during a training exercise.

Ben Porat said that in her initial investigation of the accident she had heard conflicting reports over how, and whether, Barak helped soldiers who were injured in the accident.

Barak, is a leading contender for the leadership of the Labor Party, which is set to hold internal elections on June 3.

Ben Porat said it was important to clarify the matter, in light of the fact that it involves an individual who could conceivably lead the country.

Schizophrenia In The Jewish Community

Researchers at The Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine and other collaborating institutions are conducting a study to understand the biological cause of schizophrenia among Ashkenazi Jews. Both environmental and genetic factors are believed to play a role in determining who is susceptible to the disease. Although schizophrenia does not occur more frequently among the Jewish population, the fact that the Ashkenazi Jewish community evolved from a limited number of ancestors and that they tend to marry individuals from the same ethnic background provides unique opportunities for the genetic analysis.

Ashkenazi Jewish families with TWO or MORE LIVING SIBLINGS who have a diagnosis of schizophrenia or schizoaffective disorder are potentially eligible for inclusion in the study. Travel is not required.

For more information, please contact Dr. Ann Pulver or Gail Ullrich, MSW, toll-free at 1-888-289-4095 or via fax at 410-955-0644 or by mail at The Johns Hopkins School of Medicine, 1615 Thames Street, Suite 205, Baltimore, MD 21231.

Gene mutation identified in cancers

TORONTO — A research team led by scientists from Mount Sinai Hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute has found that the BRCA2 gene mutation previously identified in Jewish breast cancer patients of Ashkenazi descent, is also eight times more prevalent in Ashkenazi men and women with pancreatic cancer than in the population-at-large.

The findings are cited in an article in the May 1997 issue of Nature Genetics. The research team is led by Dr. Mark Redston, pathologist, Mount Sinai Hospital; Dr. Hilmi Ozcelik, scientist, Department of Pathology and Laboratory Medicine at Mount Sinai Hospital and Dr. Steven Gallinger, scientist, Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute and surgeon at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Through identification of the BRCA2 gene, one of the two genes previously identified as responsible for hereditary breast and ovarian cancers, scientists have been able to conclude that a certain proportion of the Ashkenazi population has an increased risk of inherited predisposition to pancreatic cancer as well.

The research involved the collection of data from both newly diagnosed pancreatic cancer patients and from pathological and clinical records of pancreatic cancer patients over a 15-year period.

The results indicate that the risk of pancreatic cancer in the Ashkenazi population carrying the mutation is estimated to be about 7 percent, compared to a risk of 0.85 percent in the general population, making some individuals about eight times at risk of developing pancreatic cancer.

The ability to identify a population at high risk for the development of pancreatic cancer may provide an opportunity to develop and evaluate prevention and early detection protocols that could lead to reduced mortality. "Currently we are unable to screen for this most devastating cancer. These findings provide an excellent impetus for the development of new screening tools, which we hope will lead to a change in the detection and cure rates, similar to those that currently exist for colon cancer," says Gallinger.

APPOINTMENT

Dr. David Matear, formerly dental director at Glasgow Dental Hospital in Glasgow, Scotland, has been appointed chief of dentistry at Baycrest Centre. He will be responsible for the ongoing management and development of Baycrest's dental program, including the dental clinic. He also plans to pursue dental research activities between Baycrest and the University of Toronto, where he is an assistant professor.

Obsessive fear of water can hinder one's activities

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Many people harbor an obsessive fear of water, preventing them from participating in many activities, says Michael Berger.

"Individuals are more likely to seek help with other fears such as the fear of flying, but they often keep their fear of water a secret and make up excuses to avoid the water," Berger says.

Berger founded Water Confidence to help children and adults cope with and overcome their phobia. The important thing, he says, is to help them realize that change is possible.

He developed techniques to teach people how to overcome fear of water.

"The first thing I do is remove the shame and help them develop their confidence before they step foot into the water."

Berger, 61, who earned a degree in commerce and finance at the University of Toronto, has helped both children and adults for more than 25 years. He worked as a swimming instructor and was in charge of the waterfront for the Jewish Camp Council. He also works with the legally blind through the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

Berger begins by trying to understand why the fear exists. He then measures the pupil's anxiety level and begins step-by-step breathing instructions, not in the water but on dry land.

He says a proper breathing technique is one of the most vital components of swimming and he has developed a "relaxation scale" that helps individuals recognize and work at their level of comfort. His pupils progress from breathing to floating and then, swimming.

"I have had a 100 percent success rate with my breathing technique," he says. "That speaks for itself."

Berger believes age is no barrier. In Ottawa, he presented a paper titled The Use of Visualization to Overcome Fear in the Elderly at the Conference of Aging in the 20th Century. His research has made him one of Toronto's foremost authorities on the subject.

"Fear of water prevents people from participating in many joyful recreational activities such as swimming, canoeing, boating, fishing and other water-related events. As a result, many of these people not only deprive themselves of pursuing a satisfying hobby, but they suffer from loss of social interaction."

He adds that "swimming stands out as a universally recognized therapy and one of the safest and most beneficial forms of physical exercise."

Fear may result from a bad experience or it may have been passed on by parents consciously or unconsciously. He says his mission is "to get this issue of the silent fear on the table."

Young actor produces, stars in Anne Frank play

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — It's not often you find a young actor who is versed in directing and producing. Leah Garbe, the 21-year-old star of the upcoming production of The Diary of Anne Frank, defies the ordinary.

Garbe stars in the play and is the producer and founder of the theatre company Encore Entertainment. Last year, in its first production, the company (previously known as Rising Star Productions) produced You're a Good Man Charlie Brown, in which Garbe premiered as producer and director.

"I had the greatest experience producing Charlie Brown," Garbe said. "I love producing. I like having control over the production."

With her strength in musicals, Garbe had originally tried to find another musical to produce for Encore's second season. "No other play stuck out," she said. "I had to find one I could first afford to do, and second, would enjoy doing."

While Anne Frank cost twice as much as Encore's first production, Garbe saw many positive aspects to producing it. The Jewish content was appealing, she said, especially because of the large Jewish population in the Vaughan area where it will be performed. It also appeals to all ages.

Garbe would eventually like to see Encore Entertainment perform exclusively children's theatre. She felt that Anne Frank was both a good way to attract a young audience and get the company's reputation known.

She had not intended on acting in Anne Frank but she couldn't pass up the opportunity to play Anne. "She's the greatest person I've ever played," she said. "She had such optimism, even being in hiding. She was so strong. Even when she was in the concentration camps, she was just happy to be outside."

The play has personal significance to several members of the cast. Most are Jewish, including veteran actor, Allan Price who plays Otto Frank, and Garbe's mother as Mrs. Van Daan. Elaine Martyn, who plays Mrs. Frank, has particular ties to the production as her own mother was in the camps with Anne.

"I love working with this cast," Garbe said. "We feel like a family."

Garbe's own family has helped nurture her for the stage. She has been performing since she was 11, featuring in numerous musicals, and studying dance and singing. Her mother has directed community theatre and combined her company with Garbe's to create Encore Entertainment. Garbe's brother is also no stranger to stage, having performed in Les Miserable and currently starring in his own television show, Skip 'in.

But Garbe herself is weary about pursuing performance as a career. Currently, she studies psychology at York University. "I really enjoy school and being a student. I like having something to fall back on." But, she is quick to add, she doesn't want to have to.

"I would love to make it as a performer and be successful," she said. "But it's so unrealistic and unpredictable. I'm not counting it out totally, but I love producing."

Anne Frank runs for five performances at the City Playhouse Theatre, from May 21 to the 24. Performances are 8 p.m. nightly, with a 2 p.m. matinee on the 24. Tickets are $15 or $12 for students and seniors. Call 733-0558 to reserve tickets.

FIFTH FILM FEST WRAPS UP, LEAVES AUDIENCES WANTING MORE

Unreeling from May 1 to 8, the fifth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival finished the way all good entertainment is supposed to — leaving audiences wanting more.

For new programming director Shlomo Schwartzberg, the biggest surprise was in seeing the enthusiasm of Toronto audiences for Jewish film.

"You get told how interested people are, but it's different when you actually experience it first-hand."

Several newsworthy incidents occurred during the fest. One of the rarest items was Sabbath in Amsterdam, made in the Netherlands in 1932. The 12-minute film shows Amsterdam Jews observing the Shabbat.

After the screening, a woman told festival organizers "that she knew and could identify every person in the film," said Schwartzberg.

Festival organizers intend to convey the information to the Spielberg Jewish Film Archives in Israel.

Similarly, after the showing of the fascinating documentary Exodus 1947, which focuses on the famous ship that never reached Palestine, two audience members identified themselves as former passengers. Both live in Toronto.

Predictably, the most controversial film was Jerusalem: An Occupation Set In Stone?, whose negative portrayal of Israel seemed to upset many people. Even so, many others expressed satisfaction that "the other side of the story" was being told.

Love it or hate it, the film's inclusion made a statement in itself. Would a Palestinian film festival likely tolerate a correspondingly negative view of themselves?

The Polish-made 1937 Yiddish film The Vow (Tkies Kaf) proved a popular favorite, filling the 650-seat theatre to capacity early Sunday evening. Audience members were kvelling during this old-fashioned shtetl romance, finding humor and pleasure in every rare Yiddishism and bashful screen kiss.

The screening of the five-part Israeli TV serial Mr. Mani, several next-day repeat screenings and a Saturday late-night showing of the Israeli film Underdogs made this "a year of innovations," said festival producer Helen Zukerman, who confirms that attendance figures were up again. Half of the 400 festival passes sold were purchased before the program was even available, she said.

Another innovation, according to Zukerman, is that rare Yiddish films like The Vow and Sabbath In Amsterdam were not rented at typically exorbitant cost from a U.S. distributor as in previous years. Instead, prints were purchased outright and made available to the festival by the private Zukerman Foundation, which Helen Zukerman heads.

"I hope these will be the beginning of a collection of old classics that will be available across Canada," she said

As the films were being sealed into cans to be returned to their various distributors, Zukerman was still tallying the numbers on what seemed to be a very good year.

For the festival, the one sour note was that York University film prof John Stuart Katz is moving to Philadelphia. Katz, who teaches courses on Jewish film, was a programming consultant to the festival since its inception.

Literary Calendar

• Acclaimed Israeli novelist A. B. Yehoshua is in Toronto May 22.

He's scheduled to give a reading and sign copies of his latest book, Open Heart, at Chapters bookstore, 110 Bloor St. W., from 1 to 2 p.m. Later the same day he speaks on The Israeli Identity: How to Fill the Black Holes with New Content, Holy Blossom Temple, 8 p.m. (Word is, the talk is not political in nature — it's literary and artistic.) Admission free.

Music & Theatre

• Musician Brian Katz gives a solo recital of original compositions, including works with Jewish themes. Mezetta Cafe, 681 St. Clair. Ave. W. (at Christie), Toronto. May 21. Sets 9:15 and 10:30 p.m. Reservations 416-658-5687.

• Introduction to Theatre for Adults, an eight-week course, starts this week at, Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St., North York. 416-636-1880, ext. 231.

• Centre Spotlight, hosted by Gloria Valentine and Eddie Rice, features singer Naomi Bell, humorist Murray Kash, musicians Vanessa Av Ruskin and Stephen Targett, raconteur Norm Gilbert, comics Allen Farkas & Michael Lebovic, and others. Winchevsky Centre. May 17, 8:30 p.m. First-time supporters $10. 416-789- 5502 or 638-2222.

Benefits and Galas

• Toronto resident Ross Rumberg, formerly of Winnipeg, has organized two evenings of comedy with all proceeds to aid Manitoba flood victims. Friends Of The Peg, May 14 and 15 at the Comedywood Club, Thornhill. Doors open 7:30 for 8:30 p.m. curtain. Tickets two for $20. 905-761-0543.

SAD TIMES

Following the tragic helicopter collision recently, restaurants and places of entertainment in Israel were closed as a sign of mourning. This street musician in Jerusalem plays a soulful tune reflecting the feelings of the nation. [Isranet photo]

KINGSTON — Steeped in Canadian history and covered in snow for much of the year, the city of Kingston, Ont., seems an unlikely spot from which a book about Jerusalem might emerge.

So it's all the more surprising to many people that the Winter 1996 issue of Queen's Quarterly — the well-established academic journal of Queen's University in Kingston — should be devoted to the theme of Jerusalem.

"People don't expect to see a quarterly that is a Canadian forum going so far as the Middle East," said editor Boris Castel. "We've gone way beyond North American ideas and expectations. The response has been very positive."

Castel, who lived in Jerusalem for 10 years until moving away about 25 years ago, said he wanted the issue to reflect "a spectrum, not necessarily of opinion, but of reflection and knowledge and origins — Palestinian and Israeli, modern and secular and religious. I wanted it to reflect all of what Jerusalem seems to stand for in the emblematic representation of that city for the rest of the world."

The front cover shows a dramatic photograph of the Jerusalem Citadel with the heading, "Jerusalem: The Battle of Memories." The nine articles on the Jerusalem theme take up more than half of the roughly 200 pages. (Other recent themes have included the history of Eastern Europe, particularly Bosnia, and the philosophy of sports.) The prose is enhanced by dozens of photographs and illustrations of the Western Wall, domes, towers, arches, churches, mosques, political figures and the ruins of buildings that did not survive the city's tumultuous history.

"Sieged, sacked and burned 50 times in 30 centuries, often in the name of God, Jerusalem witnesses today its latest battle, the battle for

Eyeglass Factory survives letdowns to celebrate its 20th anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Over 400 people attended the 20th birthday celebration of The Eyeglass Factory recently.

Owner/optician Lorne Kashin, 43, says he threw the birthday party to show his appreciation to his customers and suppliers who have been loyal and supportive despite his numerous setbacks.

Kashin has been plagued by robberies at his Doncaster location. He says several years ago he was almost forced to close.

After the latest robbery took place despite his spending $5,000 in security upgrades, he posted a sign in his store that read: "Please excuse our lack of inventory—it is due to our ninth break in."

Elaine Botnick, who is in charge of special promotions, said she felt the rash of thefts had occurred because "glasses are a hot commodity and are no longer only a necessity; sunglasses can cost up to $500."

Kashin believes that to operate a business, the owner should be present at all times and says he is proud to have been in business for 9 years "at a time when small businesses are struggling to survive. The Eyeglass Factory [shows] that anything is possible."

Botnick attributes Kashin's success to his "true caring, quality products and professional service of his five staff members." She adds that Kashin realizes that today it is important to do more than just sell eyeglasses.

Botnick presents trunk shows — displays by sales representatives of their entire collections in the form of fashion eye wear shows, as well as special kids' weeks to raise public awareness of children's needs, teenage programs to educate them on the difference between designer and knock-off sunglasses, and information clinics on low vision aids for people who have suffered vision loss.

"Whenever we see a need for education pertaining to eyewear fashion, which includes lenses, we create a day or week dedicated to the issue at hand," says Botnick.

Kashin says that one of his objectives is to create and maintain a friendly and trusting attitude where customers will not hesitate to come back for even the smallest detail. And many of them were there to enjoy the birthday celebration.

Tourism down 15 percent

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Tourism Ministry statisticians reported last week that the continuing decline in the number of foreign tourists has abated, although there were 15 percent fewer visitors during the first three months of 1997 than in the same period last year.

According to the ministry statistics, there were 528,100 visitors from abroad during the first quarter, a number which includes 36,700 cruise passengers and 116,900 who entered through land border crossings.

Controversy obstructs El Al privatization

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

Differences in opinion among members of the government comittee on the privatization of El Al are preventing the compilation of its recommendations, a senior government official said.

The committee should have presented its proposals to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu by early January, but ongoing differences over the method of privatization and particularly the thorny issue of flights on Shabbat are causing the hold-up, according to the official.

However, another senior government source denied there are disagreements and said the committee is only weeks away from completing its work.

The committee will probably present its recommendations some time this month.

Film professor returning to his U.S. roots

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — John Stuart Katz, a York University professor and consultant to Toronto's annual Jewish film festival, is saying goodbye to Toronto this month precisely 30 years after he arrived for what he thought would be a temporary stay of only a few years.

A native of Cincinnati, Katz received a doctorate in English literature and education from Harvard, then came here to begin teaching at OISE, the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education. It was 1967, and Katz, seeing the triangulated maple-leaf logo of the Expo '67 World's Fair on roadsigns, instantly saw a resemblance between that symbol and the six-pointed Magen David.

"I joked, 'What a wonderful medinah, there are Jewish stars everywhere,'" he recalled.

He joined the staff of York University as a film professor about 25 years ago and started teaching a course on Jewish film some 10 years ago, thereby ensuring that others would see plenty of Jewish stars, too.

John Stuart Katz bids farewell.

He also taught courses in documentary film, screenwriting and the Canadian film industry, and was chair of York's film department for five years.

A consultant and co-programmer of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival since its inception, Katz introduced many films to festival-goers over the past five years. He has written four books on film and co-wrote the feature film Isaac Littlefeather, dealing with a Native American boy who is brought up as an observant Jew.

As though following a film script straight from Hollywood, Katz is getting married and moving to Philadelphia.

"The director of the Jewish film festival of Philadelphia introduced me to my fiancee at the Montreal Film Festival about four years ago," he said.

He is taking a sabbatical from York next year and retiring the year after. In the meantime, he is set to start teaching as an adjunct professor at the University of Pennsylvania in the fall. He also expects to do some consulting for the Jewish film festival in Philadelphia.

"I have a bittersweet feeling about leaving Toronto," he said.

"Canada and Toronto have been very good to me for the past 30 years, and I've loved living here. There are certain things that I'll miss very much, like my friends and my former students.

"On the other hand, I feel like it's time to 'go home' — to go back to the United States," he continued. "I feel a longing for the east coast."

Academic journal focuses on Jerusalem appropriation of memory," Castel writes in the one-page introduction.

Four articles deal with civic history, two others with architecture, but all seem to pay at least some attention to the particular problems associated with Jerusalem as being a holy city to three world faiths.

To A.P. Thornton, Jerusalem is "a place where three of the world's monotheistic religions have managed to make their house, but not their home." Thornton concludes: "Three faiths are two too many for any one Holy City" to accommodate.

Ken Sherman's The Master of Repetition is perhaps the most impressionistic piece of writing in the quarterly. It describes an encounter with a blind beggar sitting without expectation on a wooden crate, who "embodied the vision of Jerusalem. His silence and patience stood for all who wait for the day of peace."

As they reflect upon Jerusalem's towers from their own academic ivory towers, the writers recall many intriguing minutiae of Jerusalem's history. John Osborne, for instance, writing on Crusader-era Christian perceptions of Jerusalem, notes that Christians after 1099 mistook the sacred Muslim shrine, the Dome of the Rock, as the Temple of Solomon, and called it "Templum Domini, or House of the Lord, its Muslim origin unknown or more probably conveniently forgotten."

Ironically, Hadia Danaji-Shakeel, writing on Jerusalem In the Prayers of Islam, notes that the Dome of the Rock has often been wrongly referred to as the Mosque of Umar, which stood on the same spot but preceded the present structure by 54 years.

"Some Muslims do not challenge this misnomer," writes the U of T professor, adding: "However, the Muslim world does object to the term Temple Mount, which is often used in the West to identify the whole area encompassing the two shrines, known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary. For Muslims, 'Temple Mount' neglects the intrinsic Islamic nature of these monuments."

Is this mere semantics, or is this author genuinely forgetful of the intrinsic Jewish nature of this site, which was known — even a millennium and a half before the birth of Islam — as the Temple Mount? This seems the only passage that, in the name of historical accuracy and mutual respect between faiths, could have used more stringent editing.

An intellectually probing book of this kind might be said to have failed if it did not contain at least one tiny contentious utterance such as this.

Taken as a whole, however, this issue of Queen's Quarterly seems a fitting tribute to the world's most holy city at the conclusion of its 3,000th anniversary celebrations. One shares the wishes of Castel and other writers that Jerusalem will soon experience peace.

Junior sailor heading to Ireland for regatta

Holtzer the pride of Island Yacht Club

Ari Holtzer at the helm of his "Opti," a floating bathtub that will take him to Ireland this summer.

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Back in April when temperatures were frigid and the wind blustery, most fair weather sailors only dreamt of putting their boats in the water. Better to wait for summery breezes and warm temperatures.

Not so for Ari Holtzer. From his perspective, it was already mid-season and time to test his Optimist in the waters of Lake Ontario in preparation for a summer of competitive racing.

Wearing an all-weather suit that doubles as a life preserver, the 14-year-old phenom was undaunted by the elements as he guided his "Opti," an 8½-foot racing pram that looks like a floating bathtub, around Toronto's inner harbor.

Its stubby appearance aside, the Opti has opened the door for Holtzer to compete in racing regattas around the world.

The pride of the Island Yacht Club's (IYC) junior training program, Holtzer is ranked third in Canada in his class and will represent this land of lakes at the World Optimist Championships in Ireland in August. He'll vie for the title against 120 other competitors who are 15 and younger.

A veteran of regattas (competitions) in Halifax, Vancouver, Boston and New Orleans and of training clinics in Miami and St. Petersburg, Fla., Holtzer has vaulted quickly to the elite ranks of Canada's sailors. He began competitive sailing only two years ago though he'd been sailing his Opti since he was about seven.

Even at his age, it takes a lot of hard work to get to the top and to stay there. Holtzer goes through a tough physical regimen that includes running and ab work. The conditioning is necessary to get in shape for Ireland, where he'll have to sail eight hours a day in strong winds while mostly "hiking out," leaning over the edge of the boat to balance its weight against the force of the wind, he said.

For Holtzer, who'll soon try out for a black belt in karate, sailing is synonymous with competition and he's willing to make the sacrifices to get to his ultimate, and not immodest, goal of three Olympics and a gold medal.

Spokespeople for the Island Yacht Club point to Holtzer's sailing success with satisfaction. Although he may be the most renowned of their junior sailors, he's not the only one, they say. Two of the club's members, Jason Kobrick, 19, and Rolf Wagschal, 18, will participate in this summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel in the two-man 470 class boat. There is no Optimist competition at the Maccabiah Games.

Both are members of the IYC's junior program and currently serve as instructors and role models for younger sailors, said Bruce Bussin, director of the junior sailing program.

The duo won the British Airways competition in Quebec last summer and participated in a series of regattas to qualify for the Maccabiah, he said.

They are among several top-ranked, competitive sailors to come out of the yacht club. Adam Bookman and Bob Palter, for example, represented Canada at the Maccabiah in 1993, Bussin said.

At the games before, in 1989, Palter competed in the laser class and won a silver medal, sailing in a rented boat that Bussin scrounged up at the last minute. He finished second behind a Brazilian sailor who had won the silver medal at the Olympic Games the year before.

His accomplishment was all the more remarkable, Bussin continued, because boats sail higher in salt water than they do in the fresh water of Lake Ontario. Sailors also have to contend with tides and different sized waves in sea water, he added.

Sailing is a highly competitive event at the Maccabiah, said Elaine Leve, the IYC's harbor-master. Sailors from warm weather climates put a lot of resources into the sport. The Americans, for example, sail in world class boats while Canadians make do with recreational craft, she said.

IYC members have participated in every Maccabiah Games going back to 1985 and in 1960, Jerry Conway and the late Mel Gould represented Canada at the Rome Olympics in a 32-foot boat.

Bussin, Ivan Lavine, currently commodore of the club, and David Bussin represented Ontario at the first Canadian Summer Games in 1969 in the soling class, an event they won.

In the mid-'80s, W. Bernard Herman was champion of the Southern Ocean Racing Circuit while other members have competed in regattas across the continent. So Holtzer's success is not unprecedented at the IYC, though he represents the club's recent success in trying to foster enthusiasm for the sport among young people.

In addition to Holtzer's success, Sam Bussin was named most improved sailor in Ontario by the Ontario Optimist Association. Coincidentally, both have younger brothers chomping at the bit, waiting to outdo their older siblings.

The junior program has generated "a wonderful spirit at the club" and serves as "a farm system" for the IYC, say Lavine and Bussin.

Young sailors often get their parents interested in the sport, eventually increasing the club's membership.Currently, the mostly Jewish IYC has 215 family members, as well as 60 kids enrolled in junior programs and another 25 young people, aged 19 to 29, in intermediate programs.

Of the juniors, only half are the children of members. They take part in a variety of Learn to Sail programs. Entry level programs are geared for kids seven to nine (they're called "kneekickers" or "pramsters"), while youngsters from 10 to 13 participate in the "Albacore" division, named after a type of boat.

Both programs lead to the intermediate level where more competitive racing is offered, including "silver sail, level 6" programming, a national level competitive grouping for older teens.

IYC kids also participate at CORK, the Canadian Olympic Race Week in Kingston. Last year, Roger Kobrick was leading the Ontario Youth Championships but forfeited his first place position when he jumped into the water to help another sailor who had been hit by a boom. Sportsmanship is one of the elements taught to young sailors, Bussin said.

While the club's younger sailors are making a name for themselves in the world of competitive racing, the IYC is today primarily a cruising club for recreational boaters, Lavine noted. IYC members have reciprocal arrangements with clubs around Lake Ontario to offer each other use of their facilities during weekend jaunts.

The club also offers its adult members social activities, including dinner dances, wine-tasting, a scotch and steak night and a traditional Friday night dinner.

Monday nights are devoted to inter-club races, which now feature an all-women's team on a 34-foot yacht. Bussin said plans are afoot to launch a second women's boat.

Life in small towns captured by Epstein

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He had to cut through three miles of bush and then hop on a freight train, but Sam Mogelon made it home in time for Yom Kippur services.

Mogelon, a news agent on the CNR Port Arthur to Sioux Lookout overnight train always had trouble coordinating his work with High Holy Day services and on this particular run, he knew he wouldn't make it unless he left the train and plunged into the bush.

This is one of the anecdotes in Jews in Small Towns, a 741-page volume by Howard V. Epstein of Atlanta, Ga., who himself grew up in Logan, a small town in Ohio.

There are 140 personal accounts by Jews who lived in communities of under 25,000, including seven by Canadians.

One of the seven is Alex Mogelon, 71, whose father made it on time for Yom Kippur. Alex and his wife, Lila, now live on a 25-acre hobby farm at Dunvegan, Ont., west of Hawkesbury, where he is engaged in video production.

Mogelon's family lived in Port Arthur and Fort William (now Thunder Bay), where Sam Mogelon had to collect the rabbi's salary of $25 a week by going door to door to the Jewish homes.

Alex wrote that he suffered beatings at the hands of anti-Semitic youths, but what he remembers most vividly is that their ball games were interrupted by Jews who needed them to make a minyan at the local synagogue.

To shorten the delay in their game that resulted when they had to wait for the 10th man, Mogelon said they recruited a non-Jewish ball player and taught him how to open a siddur (backwards) and say a few words of prayers.

In another anecdote, Saul Berger wrote, "As a child growing up in Estevan [in Saskatchewan], I had my share of fights where I was called 'dirty Jew,' but as I excelled in school and at sports, I earned the respect of the gentiles. However I never achieved friendships that lasted into adult life.

Howard V. Epstein

"I am intensely Jewish, but not religious. I love the State of Israel and pray for its well-being. I have four children, all married to Jews, all very pro-Israel, and a son who has made his home in Israel. My experience in being raised in a small town strengthened my conviction that Jews need the homeland that is Israel, that Israel needs support and that Israel is a refuge and a bulwark against the ever present hostility of the outside world."

Rudy Brill, of Corunna, seven miles from Sarnia, said lots of young Jews move to Sarnia, "but about half don't even care about Judaism and the rest have their careers, and a promotion usually means a move somewhere else."

Minna Loewith of Lynden, Ont., came to Canada from Sudetenland with her parents and a group of farmers. "I am convinced that the Canadian government, which was most hostile to Jews at the time, did not ask about our religion, and thus our lives were spared."

Loewith and her husband still live on a farm they bought in 1947. "Not one of our neighbors is Jewish," she wrote. "In all these years we did not encounter any hostilities."

For further information about Jews in Small Towns, call or write Howard V. Epstein, 2513 Melinda Drive, NE., Atlanta, Ga., 30345-1918, 404-636-0748. The book sells for $39.95 (US) plus $5.50 postage and handling.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My mother is 52 and had a stroke just over a year ago. She has gone through extensive therapy this past year to be able to walk and talk again. On the outside, she is not exactly the way she was before her stroke. Mom walks using a cane and has a very definite limp. She has trouble using her right arm, but is getting better every day. Her speech was affected as well, but that too is improving. Mom is a very proud and determined person and I have no doubt at the rate she is improving, she will overcome this, as she has many other obstacles.

The problem is not my mom, it is what we once called her friends. Before her stroke, mom had a large group of friends, both couples and single people. She used to go with them to the theatre, to dinners and to their cottages in the summer.

Where are they now? Since her stroke they have slowly disappeared. One by one, they have left mom alone. Fortunately, my dad has been a pillar of strength for her, but I know he is devastated by the loss of what they thought were their good and close friends.

Have you ever heard of this before? Is there anything I can do to help reunite mom with her friends?

Fake Friends

Dear Fake Friends,

Your mom sounds like the kind of person anyone would be fortunate to have for a friend, someone you can not only have fun with, but can learn from as well.

My guess is that your mother's friends don't care about her any less, but they either feel awkward, or don't know exactly how to approach your mother's disability. People are often uncomfortable or even scared when something like this happens to someone close. It reminds us of how vulnerable we all are, and some people find that hard to accept.

There are two roads your mother can take. She can break the ice by making the first call and reassuring her friends that she is still the same person. Once this happens, that nervous barrier they have built may begin to melt.

The other route is to make new friends, friends who understand what she and her family are going through — possibly through a support group.

Just remember how lucky your mother is to have survived and have a strong and supportive family. Either way, with that kind of courage and determination, this lady is a winner.

Court rules on Law of Return

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Immigration and refugee advocates are hailing a recent Federal Court decision they hope will quell the explosive debate on refugee claims to Canada by Jews.

Officials say the ruling is historic, as it marks the first time a Canadian court has examined in detail Israel's Law of Return, which has been the source of much controversy in legal and immigration circles here.

Jewish communal officials hope the ruling will clarify, once and for all, Canada's policy on admitting Jewish refugees.

In a decision handed down earlier this month, a Federal Court judge found that Jewish refugee claimants cannot be denied asylum in Canada solely because, as Jews, they can go to Israel.

Even though the Law of Return gives every Jew the right to Israeli citizenship, with few exceptions, a clearly-expressed desire to settle in the Jewish state is first required, Justice William McKeown ruled.

The ruling overturns a decision last year from the Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB), which denied refugee status to Lioudmila Katkova, a Ukrainian Jewish woman, on the grounds that she could automatically receive asylum in Israel.

The IRB panel found that Katkova did have a well-founded fear of persecution in Ukraine, but that she should first make a claim under Israel's Law of Return, rather than in Canada. The board said that because she's Jewish, Katkova, is, in effect, a potential Israeli national.

In a strongly-worded decision, McKeown said the IRB panel "ignored extensive evidence" that Katkova did not want to go to Israel, noting she stated as much "on at least four occasions," and even gave reasons: her husband is not Jewish, and she feared terrorist attacks.

Quoting directly from the 1950 Law of Return, McKeown says the statute only applies "to every Jew who has expressed his desire to settle in Israel."

The law "does not say that every Jew should return to Israel...the desire to settle in Israel is

IN AN ORCHARD, LEARNING

In 1958, Israel's Foreign Ministry initiated Mashav, Israel's International Development Cooperation Program, which in its 39 years of existence has provided more than 50,000 people in 137 countries with knowledge and techniques to contend with and hopefully conquer hunger, poverty and disease in their respective homes. Recently, Mashav has expanded its programs to include AIDS treatment and disaster control managment, as well as offering courses in an enhanced role for women in agricultural development. Setting limits to missile warfare

By STEVE RODAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Iran's got them. Syria's got them. Even the Palestinians are trying to get them. That's the story of the Middle East missile race confronting Israel.

Far from the missile batteries is Yoram Dinstein, who is trying to figure out if all this is legal.

Dinstein, an expert on international law and president of Tel Aviv University (TAU), is one of the organizers of an effort by jurists to draft guidelines on the conduct of air war. The questions his panel, working in San Remo, Italy, are addressing include the following: When can countries use missiles and against what targets; what targets can be bombed from the air; how can the international community maintain no-fly zones; and how can airborne medical relief be ensured?

In other words, Dinstein says, how do countries at war ensure that civilians on the ground don't bear the brunt of the battle?

Feature

The first and only time an international agreement was drafted on air battle was in 1923, before the days of missiles or strategic bombing.

"Until 1943, bombers were so imprecise that they did not cause any military damage," Dinstein says. "Moreover, the entire issue of missile warfare is so new, and Israel has probably more experience in facing the missile threat than most."

The Arab missile buildup, Dinstein points out, has been formidable. Syria is said to have 1,000 missiles. Iran is developing a huge arsenal. The Palestinians, Israeli security sources say, are trying to smuggle in Katyusha rockets. The matter is further complicated given that in an air war, decisions are far more rapid than in either a battle on sea or land.

"In land warfare, you have a flag," Dinstein says. "You could put up signs. You could do the same with ships and anybody can see whether that ship is neutral. But in the air everything is so fast, it requires immediate decisions."

The missile issue is perhaps the most immediate and least understood, Dinstein says. How can a country fire missiles at another and

White Supremacist Jailed

SARNIA — A Toronto-area man linked to the Heritage Front has been jailed for three years for 10 offenses, including assault with a weapon and uttering death threats.

The charges arose in connection with acts of violence he perpetrated while attempting to recruit youths who opposed his racist views.

Gifts Donated

TORONTO — Devorah Bess Goodman celebrated her bat mitzvah with family and friends, as well as with many grantees from the New Israel Fund (NIF) and National Anti-Poverty Organization (NAPO) last month.

In her bat mitzvah invitation, Goodman asked her guests, instead of giving her a gift, to make donations to the NIF or the NAPO. To date, her request has resulted in gifts of over $2,000 for the NIF and over $1,200 for NAPO.

ISRAEL

Secret Plans

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials are secretly considering plans to expand the municipal boundaries of Jerusalem, the Israeli daily Ha'aretz suggested last week.

Senior political officials involved in planning the greater metropolitan area view it as an important move prior to the final-status negotiations with the Palestinians, the paper reported.

Bloodshed Feared

JERUSALEM — Norwegian Foreign Minister Bjorn Tore Godal is warning of bloodshed if the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations are not resumed soon.

Godal, whose country was closely involved in forging the Israeli-Palestinian peace agreements, often referred to as the Oslo accords, made the comment in Cairo after conferring with Egyptian officials.

Israel 2000

JERUSALEM — The Israel Bank Association and the Kahanoff Foundation — a private Canadian organization dedicated to creating and developing innovative solutions to societal problems — have pledged $3 million to Israel 2000, the first project to create a model for cooperation between corporations and volunteer organizations.

WORLD

Holocaust Commission

PRAGUE — The Czech Republic's Presidential Office established a commission to study the country's Holocaust era.

The seven-person commission includes academics, members of the local Jewish community and representatives of other Czech groups persecuted during the war.

Israel Blasted

GENEVA — Israel is rejecting the conclusions of a United Nations committee that it uses torture against suspected terrorists.

The Geneva-based UN committee against torture recently called on Israel to "cease immediately" the use of such techniques as sleep deprivation and violent shaking, saying this constituted torture and broke international law.

Israel immediately lashed out at the 10-member committee, saying it was being singled out, that the findings were based on the "hearsay evidence" of non-governmental organizations, and that Israel was employing only commonly used anti-terrorism methods.

Neo-Nazi Parade

BUENOS AIRES — In the first neo-Nazi demonstration here in years, a small group this week marked the first anniversary of the death of a skinhead who was killed in a street fight with left-wing activists.

Reform, Orthodox Unite

NEW YORK — The Reform and Orthodox movements created a shared letterhead in an effort to free Jonathan Pollard.

Rabbis Eric Yoffie and Raphael Butler, the heads, respectively, of the Reform movement's Union of American Hebrew Congregations and of the Orthodox Union, wrote to U.S. President Bill Clinton, asking him "in the noblest spirit of biblical teaching" to "show mercy to Jonathan Pollard and commute his prison sentence."

Argentinian Probe

BUENOS AIRES — The Argentine government has created a national committee to probe how many Nazi officials arrived in the country after World War II, the level of protection extended to them by local authorities and the transfer of Nazi gold to Buenos Aires.

RIETS' Centennial

NEW YORK — Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS) will celebrate 100 years as North America's pre-eminent centre for Torah scholarship at a centennial convocation on May 28.

Rabbi Norman Lamm, president of RIETS and of Yeshiva University, of which RIETS is an affiliate, will be honored at the convocation.

MEIR RETURNS FROM ROMANIA

Premier Golda Meir returned from her three-day visit to Romania amid indications that the friendly relations between Israel and Romania will become ever closer in the future although the two countries are far apart in their assessment of Middle East peace prospects.

Meir scotched speculation that Romania might assume a mediating role between Israel and the Arab states. She avoided saying whether her visit, the first by an Israeli premier to a Communist bloc nation, would contribute to improved relations between Israel and other nations of the East European bloc.

OTTAWA GROUP TO VISIT ISRAEL

A delegation from the federal departments of industry and transport will be going to Israel shortly for negotiations on the sale and installation of equipment to improve Israel's air, road and rail transportation.

Israel is considering many improvements in their rail travel and Canadian consultants are conducting a study.

These are signs of the continuing expansion of Canada-Israel trade which was marked last week by the visit of the first Israeli trade mission to Canada in over 10 years.

Bogutin case heads overseas

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Nazi-occupied Ukraine swarmed with police units, including local volunteer forces that collaborated in the German policy of killing enemies of the Reich, a Federal Court judge was told last week.

Ukrainian militias were involved in local law enforcement and "the killing of Jews, communists, Gypsies was part of this enforcement of law," said Prof. Franz Golczewski, a German historian testifying in the Wasily Bogutin war crimes case.

Bogutin, 88, faces the loss of citizenship and deportation for allegedly lying to Immigration officials about his wartime activities. Government authorities allege Bogutin was an investigator with the Selidovka police from 1941-43 in southeast Ukraine, about 100 kilometres from Stalingrad. They allege he took part in the execution of a Jewish family and a former militiaman, was at the site of an execution of 10 people at a mine shaft on the outskirts of Selidovka, beat and interrogated prisoners and ordered the arrests of young girls for forced labor in Germany.

Bogutin has denied the charges. His lawyer, Orest Rudzik, claims Bogutin merely worked as a warehouseman and postman for the Selidovka police. In opening remarks, Rudzik told Judge William McKeown that since his client was half-Jewish, his Ukrainian mother helped get him the police jobs to make him inconspicuous to German authorities.

Testifying last week, Golczewski said the Selidovka police consisted of volunteers who were institutionally subservient to the German gendarmerie and remained so until Soviet forces advanced and overran the city in 1943.

Some joined the police to get better access to food, which was in short supply. Responding to a question from Justice Department lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe, Golczewski said Jews were not allowed to join the police unit.

In an affidavit filed with the court, Golczewski described instances where the Selidovka police participated with German units in the persecution and execution of Jews and non-Jewish civilians.

In addition, "the enforcement of labor programs was usually carried out by the German and especially the local police authorities," Golczewski's affidavit states.

After wrapping up Golczewski's testimony, court recessed until it reconvenes in Donetsk, the largest city near Selidovka, to hear testimony from 13 Ukrainian witnesses. Following the evidence-gathering commission, which will sit from May 26 to June 13, court will reconvene in Toronto after Labor Day. Bogutin, who suffers from emphysema and was not in court last week, is expected to testify at that time.

MURAL DEDICATED AT BETH EMETH

Renowned Holocaust scholar Yaffa Eliach (right) joined Toronto artist Dubi Arie (centre) at Beth Emeth Synagogue last week for the dedication of a quarter-scale replica of Arie's mural, Under the Wings of God and the Shadow of Amalek, to be on permanent display in the shul's foyer. It was dedicated by Temi Schreiber (left) in memory of her parents, Norman and Regina Silver. An interview with Prof. Eliach will appear next week. [Ron Csillag photo]

In Jewish world, no-one's a stranger

Many years ago, a young man visiting Geneva during the damp, pre-spring chill of March walked into a dry goods store to buy a pair of gloves.

As soon as he walked into the store, he immediately sensed the familiar air and aroma of his father's clothing store far away, back home in Toronto: a distinctive conglomerate smell emanating from the countless unopened plastic wrappings on the piles of shirts about to fall from their chaotic stacks on the counter, the unmistakably heavy presence of wool and tweed rolled, undoubtedly, into yards and yards of bolts of cloth somewhere in the back of the store, and the somewhat musty, sour scent of flattened cardboard cartons crunching under foot.

Breathing deeply, the young man inquired about the availability of a suitable, namely inexpensive, pair of gloves. He quickly selected a pair, paid for them and was on his way out of the store.

With one foot already out the door, he heard a voice say: Shalom.

Sitting behind the serving counter at the opposite end of the cash register was an old woman, wearing a black cardigan sweater over a pale blue dress. Her silver grey hair was tied tightly into a bun. She nodded at the young man, smiled, and said again: Shalom.

The young man looked towards her and returned the greeting.

Eventually, he discovered that the old woman and her daughter, the woman who had sold him the gloves, had fled Germany before the war and settled in Geneva, where they had lived ever since, that she had seen instantly the Jewish "imprint" on his face, and that she wanted, simply, to say hello.

Of course, he was invited to their home for Shabbat. And of course he went, glad for the glow of the candles, the kiddush, the meal, the company, the warmth, the understanding, the aspect of family and the feeling of community, grateful that he was not alone, so very far away from his home in Toronto.

* * * * *

Last week, a middle-aged man visiting Montreal, needing to say Kaddish for his father, walked into the chapel of the Shaar Hashomayim seeking a minyan.

As soon as he entered, he immediately sensed the familiar air and aroma of the places of worship from his home, not far away, in Toronto. He breathed deeply its comforting air.

The chapel is a serene chamber of symmetry and simple lines, with the elegance of dark, wooden panelling on three of the four walls; the brightness and clarity of tall windows on the fourth wall; the deep, red carpeting; and the Aron Kodesh commanding the centre of the bimah.

No sooner had he removed his overcoat than an older man walked towards him, his hand outstretched in greeting, smiled and spoke what has been spoken between strangers in Jewish places of worship for thousands of years: Shalom.

Places of worship

The older man's gentle hello was like a hand around the middle aged man's shoulders.

"Where are you from? How long are you staying? Are you by any chance, a kohen or a levi?"

Eventually, a number of the worshippers walked over to the visitor, offered him their good wishes and exchanged those little pieces and extracts of information which sometimes lead to the discovery of common acquaintances.

Thus, the visitor was able to recite the Kaddish for his father. He stood alongside the others saying Kaddish, part of their minyan, one of them even though a "stranger."

The visitor was invited to breakfast downstairs, after which the older man, the first to greet him, drove him back to his hotel.

Throughout the prayers, the middle-aged man felt great surges of gratitude towards the minyan that enabled him to say Kaddish for his father, the individuals in the elegant chapel of the Shaar Hashomayim, none of whom he had met before that morning.

Now, in Montreal, he felt precisely the same feeling he had felt 25 years earlier in Geneva, when he was glad for the glow, the company and the warmth of a shared Shabbat with "strangers," sustaining aspects of family and the feeling of being at home in one's community.

Election Airing

The highlight of the third week of the election campaign was the leaders' "debates."

In our view, "debates" is hardly the proper terminology to describe the childish, schoolyard-like exchanges and occasionally even churlish back and forth bickering among the candidates, each constantly interrupting the other, each essentially pleading with the TV audience: "Notice me, notice me!"

* * * * *

Experts, commentators and pundits credited Jean Charest in the post-debate "winners" and "losers" analysis as having uttered the most memorable lines in the English-language debate.

"If there's one commitment I made to my children, it's that I'm going to pass on to them the country I received from my parents."

I hope and pray he, and all federalists, succeed in fulfilling this commitment.

No one questions Charest's fervent federalist leanings or his loyalty to both Quebec and Canada, but he has never said how he and his party plan to counter the separatists.

The issue is too important for Canadians, including Quebecers, to accept his views on faith.

* * * * *

Politicians, editorialists and commentators in Quebec sympathetic to the separatist cause are urging Prime Minister Jean Chrétien to answer unambiguously whether he would respect a majority vote by Quebecers for separation. Of course, this was the central frustration they felt with the unfortunate and untimely interruption of the French-language debate.

By the time this issue of The CJN reaches readers' homes, the debate will have resumed and concluded, and perhaps that specific question asked of the prime minister and answered.

It puzzles me, however, and I find it inconsistent at the very least, that separatists always hector the prime minister, and indeed other federalists for a definitive answer to this hypothetical situation. Yet, they themselves are reluctant even to discuss the possible language of the next referendum question let alone promise to frame it clearly, simply, without ambiguity.

Shabbat, shul said key to family life

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Most non-Jews perceive the Jewish family as being a bastion of religious life and the source of survival for Jews, says Rabbi Dow Marmur, senior rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple.

"Would-be converts are firm about the importance of the family in Judaism and are determined to be part of it. Such is the power and truth of the myth," he said.

Rabbi Marmur was the second speaker in the three-part series, The Jewish Family in Crisis, sponsored by Canadian Friends of Shalom Hartman Institute and held recently at Adath Israel Synagogue.

The reality, however, he said, is that the Jewish family is in danger of breaking down because of intermarriage.

"Very often the Jewish [partner] resents the commitment to Jewish life [taken on by their spouse.] I know a Jewish man who divorced his wife because she converted to Judaism," he said.

Even in many households where both partners are Jewish, said Rabbi Marmur, there is "a minimum reference to Judaism except in life cycle events such as bnei mitzvah, and those events are held outside the home. [Too many] homes are merely a shelter, elegance notwithstanding."

So many parents are busy working and taking their children to various activities, he said, that they "have become their children's CEOs and do nothing about turning the myth of the Jewish family into reality."

Assimilation, he said, means adapting to the mores of secular culture, "and these challenge traditional family values. Same-sex families are growing and one-third of all children live in two families. Rarely are these two in agreement as to the place of Judaism in their lives."

Though things may become complicated, however, it is not hopeless, said Rabbi Marmur. "The same way as immigrant families survived, there is hope for us as well."

He said that to keep the myth alive, Jews must first of all recognize Shabbat.

Shul, he said, is important, because it provides for things the home may not be able to provide.

The third way to keep the myth alive, he said, is through shalom, "which stands for wholeness and integration. Shalom brings fractured pieces together and before we mend the world out there, we must mend inside ourselves. Shalom bayit offers peaceful harmony within each family and within each family member."

Loss of Jewish values poses threat to community: Abella

BY BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The Jewish community of Canada may be one of the fastest growing in the Diaspora, but its leaders still have cause for concern, warns York University professor Irving Abella, chair of the task force on Jewish identity of the Council of Jewish Federations of Canada.

Abella, past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, recently addressed some 200 people on the topic, Surviving Freedom: Can Canadian Jewry and Jewish Values Make It in the 21st Century?

"It seems we are at the zenith of our existence in this country," he said, noting that as members of an open, democratic society, Canadian Jews have achieved prominence in such areas as film, literature, science and education.

"Jews hold positions of influence our parents only dreamed of," Abella said.

But he expressed concern about whether the Canadian Jewish community "can continue on into the 21st century with the same vigor and vitality."

Assimilation, which has led to the erosion of Jewish values and a significant rate of intermarriage, poses a serious threat to Jewish communal life in most western countries as well as Canada, Abella said.

"We are all obsessed with the problem of the disappearing Jew ...The open democratic society may lead to our greatest defeat. Jewish lives are not in danger. Jewish life is."

He pointed to some alarming statistics on assimilation in the United States: A generation ago, there were six million American Jews; now there are only 440,000 affiliated households with some 1.5 million couples in interfaith unions. Three times as many children under the age of four are born to interfaith as to Jewish couples and interfaith offspring are 90 percent less likely to be raised as Jews.

Alarming statistics

Addressing the issue of the disintegration of Jewish values, Abella charged that the Jewish community in Canada, once known for its progressiveness, its tolerance and its leadership in social justice matters, has grown "indifferent" to poverty, women's rights and social policies.

Material possessions are more important to young Jewish adults than issues related to social justice and compassion, values that are so central to Judaism, he said.

"They don't share the value system of their parents and grandparents. Our grandparents were the conscience of Canadian society."

Referring to a survey of people under the age of 40 from several Canadian ethnic communities, Abella said the Jewish representatives were the most affluent and the least tolerant among their ethnic peers.

"Our young people are more parochial, materialistic and intolerant. This is the price we have to pay for our success."

He stressed that there's nothing wrong with the pursuit of wealth, but it should not be at the expense of one's contribution to society.

He called on the community to spend more money on services for Jewish university and college students. "The community has cut back...These organizations [serving Jewish students] need to protected to ensure our future."

Abella was the guest speaker at the annual Rosalynd Smith Memorial Lecture held at Adath Israel Congregation.

Conflict, drama draw journalists to Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel is a natural magnet for news because it provides journalists with unending drama and conflict.

So although there's a lot of coverage of Israel, no media outlet deliberately distorts its reporting on the Jewish state, a panel on media coverage of Israel agreed recently.

Journalists Dana Lewis, Patrick Martin and Linda Scherzer examined a touchy subject: Why does tiny Israel seem to dominate newspapers and television screens? Are the media biased against the Jewish state? Or are Jewish media consumers just too sensitive?

Lewis, CTV's Mideast bureau chief since 1992, said Israel is a "compelling and conflict-driven story," but one that is seeing less prominence because all international news is getting less play.

News, he conceded, "is a lot about ratings. A new breed of journalists has to hear a lot about what sells. Conflict will always make it. Features and perspectives often won't."

Reporters cover Israel the way they do, "because we believe it's important for human rights. That's not why we're there, but it is a by-product."

He defended CTV's coverage of Israel, saying it's "factual, not fiction."

Martin, the Globe and Mail's former Mideast bureau chief and now its foreign editor, said nothing elicits more reaction from readers than the Middle East.

As for allegations of bias, Martin said the Jewish community's own newspapers often exhibit notable slants. He cited the Jewish Tribune, B'nai Brith Canada's in-house newspaper, for describing Israel's handover of Hebron to the Palestinians as a loss for Jews and a victory for Arabs. "Yet the Knesset voted 87 to 17 in favor [of ceding Hebron]," Martin said, "and that was buried [in the paper]."

He added that Israel seems to receive coverage that is out of proportion to its size because it is open to many foreign reporters "who have to justify their existence."

The Globe applies several tests before deciding to run a story, Martin noted: Is it news, that is, was the event unexpected or did an expected event have a significant impact? How far away did it happen? And the "touchiest:" How similar to Canada is the society in which it happened?

Using those criteria, Canadian readers "have become conditioned" to be more interested in Israel than most other countries. "There's a great deal of interest in Israel. Canadians want to read about it."

Scherzer, who was CNN's correspondent in Israel for five years, said nothing in her experience prepared her for "the big leagues." Mainly, she said, she was shocked by the hostility she encountered to her reporting.

For example, she found that irate viewers were quick to brand non-Jewish reporters in Israel as anti-Semites, while the Jewish reporters were frequently called self-hating Jews.

Scherzer said that while her Jewish identity stirred, especially when Iraq attacked Israel in the Gulf War, "I had to put my private feelings and professional feelings into two separate boxes within myself. In order to have any credibility, I had to use the fundamentals of journalism, and call it the way I saw it."

She rejected the old axiom that if a report offends both sides, it must be true. "Given the passion and complexity of [the Mideast], perceived bias often depends on who is watching. Before you blame the messenger, take a good, hard look at individual reports. What's important is that we use honesty and integrity. We call it the way we see it, to the best of our ability."

The panel was presented by State of Israel Bonds' New Leadership.

AIDS Memorial Day set

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 32nd day of the counting of the Omer — the 49 days of mourning observed by Jews between Passover and Shavuot — has been selected Jewish AIDS Memorial Day, Lev b'Omer.

Rabbi H. Raphael Goldstein and Norman Sandfield, co-chairs of the International Jewish AIDS Network, said the memorial day, falling this year on May 25, has been established "in response to the growing number of Jewish people who have died of AIDS-related illnesses and the tendency of many to think that the epidemic has not — and does not — affect the Jewish community."

The Hebrew letters for 32, lamed and bet, spell out the Hebrew word lev, heart.

"Jewish AIDS Memorial Day, Rabbi Goldstein said, "touches directly the hearts and minds of all of us who have loved and lost people to AIDS and will, we hope, touch the hearts of the people who have tended to ignore this growing, unending epidemic."

Synagogues and religious institutions in the United States and Canada are being urged to observe Lev b'Omer with special prayers of comfort, hope and remembrance.

Congregation Keshet Shalom, which serves the needs of the Greater Toronto lesbian, gay and bisexual Jewish community, has not scheduled a formal observance of Lev B'Omer, but plans to recite Kaddish at the conclusion of the annual AIDS Candlelight Vigil, in Cawthra Park on Thursday evening, June 26.

Health and healing explored

TORONTO — To make the community aware of its chaplaincy programs and healing projects, Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue is hosting a panel discussion May 28, 7:30 p.m., entitled How Jewish Faith Can Be a Healing Power in Coping with the Complexities of Life.

For several decades, doctors have realized that the spiritual can play an important role in the care of patients and their families. This is true, even when the patient has a terminal illness.

Chaplains in the Jewish community, visit not only those in the hospital, but people in nursing homes, convalescent homes and penal institutions, because Judaism recognizes that people find additional strength when they see that they are still important to family and friends.

Panel speakers will include Dr. Vivian Rakoff, former chief psychiatrist at Clarke Institute; Rabbi Mark Dratch, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation; and Etta Ginsberg McEwan, social worker.

The moderator will be Rabbi Joseph Kelman, of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, who was instrumental in establishing the chaplaincy program through Canadian Jewish Congress. Rabbi Kelman is president of the Association of Jewish Chaplains of Ontario, co-sponsors of the event along with the Toronto Jewish Healing Project, an organization dedicated to providing support and programs to those experiencing anxiety.

A place for Ontario to stand

Traditionally, provincial governments do not wade into federal election campaigns. Generally speaking, this is as it should be, both by courtesy and by propriety. It is a good rule.

However, as with all rules, there are occasionally compelling circumstances which transform into exceptions.

The national unity issue of the current federal election campaign is one such compelling circumstance. It therefore warrants being treated as an exception.

It is widely assumed the referendum trauma will reach another boil during the mandate of the next parliament. As a result, it is incumbent upon Canadians, and especially federalist Quebecers, to elect the highest number of federalist members as possible.

When seen in this light and for this purpose — namely to encourage the widest possible federalist Quebec vote — it is appropriate, indeed desired, during the short time remaining in the campaign, for provincial governments to enter the national unity fray.

We note that Premier Ralph Klein of Alberta has already done so.

Earlier in the campaign he issued a statement which, as the Globe and Mail noted, "was a veiled swipe at the Reform party's Quebec policy." Klein roundly criticized his fellow Albertan's constant resort to the code language of constitutional "equality" and called upon Canada "to enable Quebec to protect those things that make it such a unique part of of our national character."

It is now time for Premier Mike Harris to issue forth a public unity stand. In particular, The CJN urges him to follow in the moderate, compromise-oriented footsteps of his predecessors: Leslie Frost, John Robarts, Bill Davis, Frank Miller, David Peterson and Bob Rae, all of whom understood and accepted Ontario's vital role of being a "bridge" between Quebec and the rest of the country.

A word "fittingly spoken" by the premier of Ontario might send an encouraging message to the undecided federalist voters of Quebec. It would also set an important example to other premiers who mistakenly believe that silence is the better, more secure place to stand in the slippery, rocky terrain of constitutional uncertainty.

Deja vu

With a surrealistic and sickening sense of deja vu, members of the Jewish community in Canada once again find themselves having to take legal steps to determine when, if at all, someone's speech can be so offensive, so hateful, and especially so dangerous to minorities as to warrant being curbed.

The case involves a column by Doug Collins, the controversial writer for the North Shore News in Vancouver. The column in question was a screed of Holocaust denial.

The Canadian Jewish Congress in British Columbia has launched a complaint with the Human Rights Commission in B. C. alleging that the Collins piece violates the B. C. Human Rights Code because it is "likely to expose a person, group or class of people to contempt or hate". Many people — inside and outside the Jewish community — will undoubtedly question the wisdom of bringing, once again, more Holocaust-denial material before the courts.

However, in our view, it is important for the civil courts to determine where an individual's right to free speech intersects with another's right to freedom from being exposed to contempt or hatred.

A cautionary note on grapefruit juice

I am writing in response to a short article (CJN, May 1) about the beneficial effects of drinking grapefruit juice in increasing the blood concentration of the drug cyclosporine.

This article is both misleading and, in fact, dangerous. Suggesting that people can gain an advantage by drinking grapefruit juice may cause serious problems. Therapeutic levels, i.e those that are not too high or too low are important in preventing toxicity or rejection/graft versus host disease respectively. Levels that are too high can be dangerous, causing both kidney and liver and possibly brain toxicity. Doses of cyclosporin are carefully adjusted to maintain these therapeutic levels. Taking grapefruit juice will push these levels into the toxic range.

On the other hand, for those individuals in whom the levels are adjusted while routinely drinking juice, there is a risk of dropping levels into the subtherapeutic range if they suddenly decrease the amount of grapefruit that they consume. This shows that more is not necessarily better and may in fact be much worse.

Equity needed in education funding

When it comes to collecting taxes for education, the government does not discriminate on the basis of language or religion. When it comes to paying for the delivery of education, some people have special rights. Specifically, Catholics and francophones are exclusively able to fund their particular education at public expense. This is equivalent to the government charging different rates of provincial sales and income taxes based on language or religion — an absurd and offensive notion. Several Liberal, NDP and Tory Ontario provincial governments have to date chosen not to rectify this inequity.

If we are to resolve the flagrant inequity in education funding, we have to overcome a great obstacle: political ideology. It will take more than community led lobbying to succeed where litigation and Royal Commissions have failed.

This is not just an issue for those who wish to send their children to an alternative school; the issue is equity, plain and simple and therefore affects us all. To that end, I encourage everyone who is concerned about equity in a pluralistic and democratic society to initiate action by writing or phoning the Education minister of Ontario.

Blind fundamentalism is the enemy

It seems that each and every day we are faced with some troubling national and international event that shocks and offends us.

Concerned Jews also have issues that more directly concern them, such as the dissemination of hate literature, anti-Semitism and the lack of activity in prosecuting Nazi war criminals. As we plead for tolerance, understanding and mutual respect, we do not need a pronouncement by the 600-member Union of Orthodox Rabbis that those of us whose religious practices identify with the Conservative and Reform branches of Judaism are not merely lesser Jews but not Jewish at all.

Rightly so, that preposterous pronouncement has been denounced by Reform and Conservative rabbis. The allegation is that Reform and Conservative leaders have led to generations of Jews being assimilated and intermarried when, I suggest in reality, it is the intolerance and retrograde thinking of the ultra-Orthodox that has driven young Jews away and pushed them towards cults and aberrations such as Jews for Jesus. Indeed, were it not for secular Jews and Orthodox Jews with some flexibility, the State of Israel would probably have been annihilated.

Blind fundamentalism, whether Christian or Islamic, has led to racism, anarchy and the destruction of basic human rights and values. It is hoped that responsible Orthodox rabbis will denounce and disassociate themselves from this retrograde resolution. I will always believe that what makes one a good person, Jew or otherwise, is what is in his heart and soul and not in his beard.

Using Rehov Bar Ilan on the Sabbath

I remember asking a Lubavitch rabbi "Where was God when six million of his chosen people were being tortured and murdered by the Nazis?" His reply was that God had given man a free mind and he respects His decision. We should not blame God.

Now I ask, if God respects man's free mind, why cannot the Haredim of Jerusalem respect the free mind of others who want to use Rehov Bar Ilan on the Sabbath. Do they consider themselves holier than God?

Ultimate fate of the Portuguese Jews

Five hundred years ago, the Jews of Portugal were forced to undergo baptism. To avoid that fate, many tried to leave; many chose death. The CJN asked Sarah Taieb-Carlen of York University to write about that period of Jewish history. Last week, we published the first part of her essay. Today we publish the second, concluding part.

By SARAH TAIEB-CARLEN

King Manoel dealt with the convertidos in the following way: from 1497 to 1512, he tried to make them assimilate and blend into the Portuguese Christian population. His policy was dictated by two conflicting wishes: to accede to the request of the king and queen of Spain who were demanding that he denounce to the Inquisition the convertidos who had fled to Portugal, and to keep, by any means, all the convertidos who had settled in Portugal because he needed not only their wealth, but also their economic, professional and diplomatic skills. Therefore, in May 1497, before the second wave of forced conversion, he passed a law forbidding the church to inquire about the convertidos' religious habits and practices.

But the memory of their king's cruelty was not so easy to erase and the richest convertidos emigrated with as much of their wealth as possible. Furious, the king reneged once more on all his promises and with the alvaras (king's letters) of 1499, he forbade the convertidos to leave Portugal and the old Christians to buy their property. The convertidos who were caught contravening the terms of these alvaras were reduced to slavery.

In 1504, the economy got worse and the convertidos, held responsible for the escalating cost of living, were repeatedly attacked. In 1505, the synagogue of Elvora was ransacked and burnt to the ground. In 1506, some convertidos caught celebrating Passover were arrested in Lisbon. A few days later, an incident triggered a violent attack on the convertidos. On the altar of the chapel of the monastery of San Domingo, according to a historian of the day, there "was a crucifix having a bit of red glass to represent the wound in the side; the monks to delude the ignorant populace, caused a candle to cast its light through the glass, which they proclaimed to be a miracle."

But a man said: "I see no miracle, it's just the reflection of the candlelight on the metal!" Realizing that the man was a convertido, the congregants fell on him, beat him to death, cut his body in pieces and burnt it. Two Dominican priests incited the crowd to act against the heresy of the convertidos and for three days, the Portuguese massacred, pillaged and raped, leaving more than 5,000 dead.

The king ordered the two Dominican priests burnt, the monastery of San Domingo closed down for a few weeks and, seemingly shaken by this senseless violence, he decided to abrogate the alvaras of 1499 and promised once more never again to interfere in the convertidos' religious life and to consider them equal to the old Christians.

He allowed them to leave Portugal with all their wealth provided they went to a Christian country. This time, the convertidos trusted their king and very few tried to leave the country where life once again became quite good for them since there was no legal restriction to their social and economic progress. They occupied the highest functions in the administration of the country such as escrivao da fazenda and desembargador do paco, respectively secretary of state and attorney general. They excelled in collecting taxes from the church and the novidades (new crops) from the farmers and they dominated the fields of medicine and pharmacy.

The king died in 1521, and when he acceded to the throne, his son Joao III, not quite 20 years of age, was full of a venomous hatred towards the Jews. He also inherited his father's devious ways and simultaneously as he confirmed the favorable measures extended by his father to the convertidos, he had people spying on them in order to uncover their lapses. In 1525, he married a granddaughter of the monarchs of Spain, his cousin Catherine, who deemed the Inquisition indispensable to any good Catholic country.

In November 1525, the Bishop of Ceuta, encouraged by the queen, persecuted the convertidos of Olivenca and had them burnt alive. People blamed the convertidos for a terrible earthquake, and they were ready for another massacre when the greatest writer of the time, and court poet, Gil Vicente, succeeded in averting it. But the king, influenced by Catherine had already decided to set up an Inquisition in his country and on Dec. 17, 1531, Pope Clement VII named the king's confessor, Fra Diogo da Silva, Great Inquisitor of Portugal. Fra Diogo first declined, but on Nov. 18, 1536, he finally asked the population to denounce the convertidos guilty of one of more of a number of practices and beliefs which he had listed carefully. For the first three years, the Inquisition was not too active, and Fra Diogo was replaced by the king's brother, 27-year-old Henrique, who proved to be a very zealous Great Inquisitor.

The Inquisition evolved into a gigantic machine which became the most deadly body of the state. The system of secret information and anonymous revelations was so widespread and subtle that everyone was suspect and no one could trust anyone anymore, even within the same family. At times, the accused were even taken from their beds to the dungeons of the Inquisition. Their property was seized immediately, to be shared by the Royal Treasury, the clergy and the Inquisition. Under incredible and unrelenting torture, the convertidos would more often than not sign a "confession" which would lead them to the infamous and barbaric auto-da-fe (act of faith).

The auto-da-fe usually took place on the occasion of a coronation, a royal wedding or a major religious holiday. It was a grandiose, pompous if terribly macabre show to which enormous crowds came for public rejoicing. The privilege of kindling the fire was granted to the highest personality present, usually the king or a distinguished guest of honor. Tens of thousands of children, men and women perished in this way.

Henrique was so ruthless an inquisitor that the pope promoted him to the rank of cardinal in 1545 for his zeal and efficiency, and he kept his office of Great Inquisitor for 30 years. He accepted the testimony of young children, and when young children were accused, he pursued them with the same intensity and zeal as he did anyone else. No one was spared: the remains of long deceased "heretics" were thrown into the fire and those who had fled the country were tried in absentia and burnt in effigy.

Expulsions 1000–1500

[Jewish History Atlas, Martin Gilbert, Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1969]

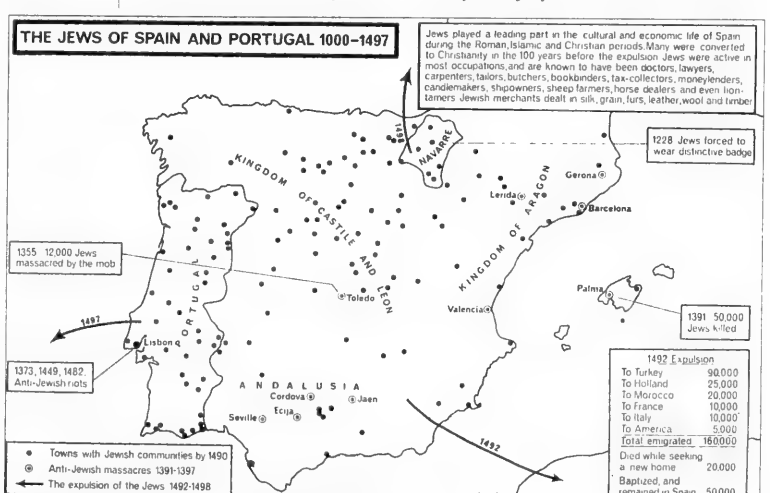
While for the Church, the convertidos were abominable heretics, they were also a source of great embarrassment for the rabbis. According to 20th-century Rabbi Hirsch Zimmels, a scholar who studied the responsa of the rabbis of Amsterdam, Hamburg, Italy, North Africa and Turkey, the rabbis decreed that the conversos and convertidos were Jews; they were like the apostates of Judaism to whom this aphorism could be applied. "A Jew, even if he/she sins, is still a Jew; they are Jews from the point of view of matrimonial legislation, but non-Jews from all other viewpoints; they are non-Jews from all viewpoints; they are worse than the non-Jews; they are like Jewish children who are prisoners of non-Jews."

With time, however, the rabbis' attitude hardened. So many conversos and convertidos left Spain and Portugal in order to live openly as Jews again, that those who stayed there out of fear or greed and those who continued to live as crypto-Jews in their new country of residence became suspicious to the rabbis.

Throughout the 16th century, the conversos and convertidos fled to North Africa and the Ottoman Empire where Dona Gracia Nasi founded congregations specifically designed to welcome Portuguese convertidos in Salonika and Constantinople; Antwerp; England; France, especially Bordeaux (where a large Sephardi community had settled in the 10th century), Nantes, Rouen and Paris; and Italy (where the Pope ignored them, except when he had a great number of Judaizers burnt alive in Ancona in 1556), especially Leghorno.

Among the most famous Portuguese Jews are: Don Isaac Abrabanel, Baruch Spinoza, Abraham Israel Pereira (one of whose descendants built the Boulevard Pereire in Paris) and Manasseh ben Israel.

There are countless others, as this anecdote tells us. One day, King Jose (1750-1777) ordered all Portuguese descended from or allied to Jews to wear a yellow hat. His confidant and closest friend, the powerful Marques de Pombal came to the palace that same evening carrying three hats. To the King's questions, he replied that he did "not know a single Portuguese of note who had not Jewish blood in his veins." The king asked him why, he was carrying three hats. De Pombal answered, "One for myself, one for the inquisitor general, and one in case your majesty should wish to be covered."



THE JEWS OF SPAIN AND PORTUGAL 1000–1497
Jews played a leading part in the cultural and economic life of Spain during the Roman, Islamic and Christian periods. Many were converted to Christianity in the 100 years before the expulsion. Jews were active in most occupations, and are known to have been doctors, lawyers, carpenters, tailors, butchers, bookbinders, tax-collectors, moneylenders, candlemakers, shipowners, sheep farmers, horse dealers and even lion-tamers. Jewish merchants dealt in silk, grain, furs, leather, wool and timber.

Taking my Jewish checklist to ballot box

By Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Once more, dear friends, into the breach — or, rather, into the election booth. Seems like yesterday we were putting our X in the box and handing in our ballots. In fact, it was practically yesterday as terms of office go, but no matter. We get a chance once more to choose our elected representatives.

How to make that choice? For many, both here and in the United States, that choice has a lot to do with the treatment Israel has received at the hands of the current government. I am presently reading the memoirs of Yitzhak Rabin written in 1979, and it is very interesting to see what his take was on the American presidents and government bureaucracies with which he dealt, both as ambassador to the United States, and then as prime minister.

(For instance he respected Richard Nixon and Henry Kissinger, whereas many Jews regarded them as enemies of Israel and consistently voted Democrat throughout the turbulent Nixon years.)

But whatever his take was, Rabin was not an American and his opinions were justifiably bound up with what he perceived was good for Israel. For us in Canada, it has been less clear what standards we as Jews should apply to our voting patterns (if any).

Frankly I am bewildered as to what to do about this election, but a large part of that is because, living in British Columbia, I am effectively shut out of any meaningful decision as to the character of the next government. But imagining I lived in the Golden Triangle, I would certainly take my Jewish checklist in hand when evaluating candidates.

No reader will be surprised to see that high on my list is the social support network promised by a candidate. Does the candidate represent a party that is committed to support programs that benefit the poor, the elderly, the disabled and the disadvantaged? Over and over again, Jewish law enjoins us as a society to deal justly. The Torah is quite clear on society's responsibilities. Maimonides set out a pretty good ladder of tzedakah, ending with the highest form as one that enables the poor to become self-sufficient. Is any party undertaking to make this a reality?

We should expect no less of our elected representatives.

Is the party seeking our votes one that goes beyond our borders to assure human rights? Is it committed to rebuking China for its undeniable abuses within China and its increasingly threatening posture on Hong Kong and Taiwan? We do have clout in Asia. Are we going to use it with the Indonesian government and other Asian states that are part of our economic sphere of influence? Or will we as a nation get as far as the cash register and no further?

Next on my list is the effort each party makes to retain the loyalty of Quebec to the idea of a united Canada. I feel a great affinity with the Québécois on some issues. They too have a strong sense of communal rights and responsibilities, a vibrant culture, a special attachment to their community and a language I find hard to master — but no matter. They too want to see a government committed to social justice. Replace the word Québécois with Jews, and you would not see much difference.

I want to vote for a party that will help Quebec to feel secure inside Canada, that will respect their need to be recognized, to maintain their social net, and at the same time be forthright enough to tell them when they have erred on the side of chauvinism and outright xenophobia and racism.

This may sound paradoxical, but any party that weakens the ability of the federal government to assure equality of treatment for all Canadians will not get my vote. The government should not divest itself of such federal responsibilities as will assure the kind of social justice I am talking about.

Finally, I would like to vote for a party that is committed to maintaining and strengthening the ability of Jews to live as Jews, unmolested by hate groups, racial slurs, and physical attack. Such a party would uphold laws that prevent free speech from becoming attack speech, speech that would encourage racial enmity and disregard for historical fact (such as Holocaust denial). I would also vote for a party that supported the peace process in the Middle East, although I realize that Canada is a minor player, if a player at all, in this regard.

Since not one piece of campaign literature has crossed my doorstep as of this writing, I may be spared the tons of nonsense which masquerades as information about the candidate and the party. On the other hand, I fear this is because not only doesn't British Columbia count, but that my riding is a done deal. Too bad. I would like to see if I could apply my checklist to our incumbent, as well as to the hopefuls now shaking hands and kissing babies.

(My riding? Not telling.)

Montreal bagels are better. So there.

By Shel Krakofsky in London

For somebody who grew up in Toronto, I have come to accept two truths about Montreal. The rival city to the east (usually) has better hockey teams. I swallow hard before making the second, more difficult admission — Montreal is the place for superior bagels.

It is unnecessary to even taste a Montreal bagel to realize it is better. The first thing a Montrealer is asked upon arriving in Toronto or any other place on the planet is, "Did you bring bagels?" Has anybody ever been asked to bring bagels to Montreal?

In this city where I now work, despite a recent avalanche of bagels, there are two outlets which boast imported bagels, one from Montreal, the other from Toronto. The so-called Toronto bagel is advertised as "Montreal-style!"

Until I chanced upon a place on St. Viateur in Montreal, I was partial to the Toronto species. My fondest childhood bagel memories are of Saturday night when my zayde would take me to Sherman's Bakery on Baldwin Street. In the cold of winter when Shabbat ended early, we would arrive as the oven was being fired up. Zayde was a mashgiach a few doors away at Berlin's butcher shop and as a courtesy to him, I was given hot Sunday bagels to preview on Saturday night.

It was a thrill I would later experience in New York City purchasing the Sunday New York Times on Saturday night. New York bagels are unfortunately as heavy as the weekend paper, though the city of Madison Avenue does have the best bagel advertising. One deli has a sign in its window:

PROTECT YOUR BAGELS
— put lox on them —

Not looking for anything in particular, I discovered the ultimate bagel once while walking the streets of Montreal. A distinctive, pungent, sweet and nostalgic aroma wafted into my nostrils and carried me back to my childhood. Following my nose, I easily found the source. Once inside the venerable bagel bakery on St. Viateur that is dedicated exclusively to making bagels, I was further transported into the 19th century.

The bagels were piled up like mounds of manna outside a flaming wood-burning stove. Hickory wood I think it was, baking those bagels in ancient, public splendor. When I took my first bite (it was a bagel pebbled with sesame seeds) I knew I had found the mother of all bagels — the Montreal bagel — the "roll model" for all bagels.

All others are too soft and doughy. Donuts without atherosclerosis. Mere rolls with holes, especially the commercial kind. Too large, too round, too uniform — too artificial. They have lost their identity.

The current popularity of bagels is driven in part by health-conscious consumers who have discovered a food with no additives or preservatives and a simple table of contents with flour, yeast, water, sugar, salt and sometimes malt. High in protein with moderate fiber and carbohydrate, the bagel has no cholesterol!

Oh for the time of simpler choices when it was more than enough to suffer existential angst over plain, sesame or poppy. These days, the varieties are as abundant as those found in ice cream parlors, a kind of multilingual plethora of choices that only add up to an illiterate smorgasbord. Where is the joy and sophistication in ordering the confused taste of an "everything" bagel with nothing on it?

Give me a traditional bagel. Smaller, imperfectly round, dense, chewy. Something that can help clean your teeth. The main difference between old-fashioned and modern bagels is this: After the batter is shaped, the bagels are first boiled in water before they are baked.

The newfangled type are not boiled, robbing the bagel of a crusty, fuller texture. Boiling is too labor intensive for the new brand of entrepreneurs.

Before the turn of the century, some Galicianers brought little to America except the baggage of history and their 200-year-old bagel recipe. Those bagels would be more authentic and universally tasty today if only for one word in the language of those immigrants. Wouldn't it have been wonderful if there existed at the time, a Yiddish word for "franchise"?

Tension and Tennis

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Thirty-six years ago when we first came to Canada, I was introduced to the all-Canadian sport. Hockey Night in Canada was obligatory to watch on Saturday nights during the winter. Since then, I must confess, the novelty has worn off, and today I don't even know who is in the playoffs, except that the absence of Toronto and Montreal has reached even me.

Fortunately, there were the Blue Jays, and when the grandchildren came to town, I would take them to the Skydome. But my interest has waned over the years and I see that I am not alone. Where formerly the seats were all taken, now there are gaping holes in the stands. Even basketball has lost me, although — when I tuned in to the game the other day by sheer accident — I did admire a six-foot midget playing amongst the giants and doing remarkably well. For me, that leaves golf and tennis, the two pastimes in which I personally continue to indulge. Though the Tiger Woods phenomenon has gotten a hold of me as it has of everyone else, tennis remains my number 1 love. When someone asked me the other day why this was so, I searched for the deeper reason. It is one of the few competitive enterprises in which sportsmanship survives. That to me is one of the abiding attractions of this sport, and I use it as a metaphor for society in general.

We are forever partisans and only rarely neutral. We rarely cheer for the opposition and are hesitant to acknowledge its merit. Tennis is one of the noble exceptions, and that's one of the reasons I have remained infatuated with it. To be sure, I hope that my favorite will carry off the palm, but if he or she doesn't, I am happy if I've seen a good match.

All of which brings me, not surprisingly, to the Jewish side of this matter. Israelis (like Diaspora Jews) are like everybody else, only more so. They are vigorously partisan, and occasionally their shouts at a soccer match create enough decibels to be heard a kilometre away.

Tennis is the great exception. It is one of the few avenues which relieves the competitive tensions that beset Israelis. That is one reason why, when Israel Tennis Centre brings its young people to Toronto, they do so not only to raise money but also to show off the best of their society. These young kids are trained to be good rather than partisan, competitive but never at the expense of fairness. The growth of tennis as the second largest participatory sport in Israel, is therefore to me a good and hopeful sign.

Best of all, Jewish tennis centres now have special programs for handicapped children: autistic, developmentally challenged, hearing-impaired and those at risk. Moreover, the centres are peace builders, for they now have joint Jewish-Arab and Bedouin programs.

On June 8, a delegation of 9- to 13-year-olds will show their stuff in Toronto. If you are interested in looking at these representatives of non-partisanship, skill and good manners, you'll have a lovely time. It is an occasion not to be missed, and Leah Rabin too will be there. If you want to come, call 905-660-1999. It's an event I am very happy to advertise.

Election '97

Health, jobs key issues in bellwether riding

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In St. Paul's, long considered a bellwether riding, health care and unemployment are emerging as key election issues.

St. Paul's

The boundaries of the mostly residential area, encompassing the area between Winona Drive, Eglinton Avenue West, Yonge Street and the Canadian Pacific railway lines, have expanded eastward from Yonge Street to Bayview Avenue between Broadway and Moore avenues. Most of the riding's northwest area has become part of Eglinton-Lawrence.

St. Paul's has a population of 110,000, with a Jewish population estimated at 18,000, as well as a significant Italian population. Residents run the gamut from young singles to seniors, with substantial numbers of tenants, new immigrants and longtime Forest Hill residents.

Liberal candidate Carolyn Bennett, 46, said voters are "very keen" to raise health care issues with her because of her profession. The family physician and lifetime area resident, who ran in St. Andrew-St. Patrick during the last provincial election, believes the Tory promise of eliminating the cash portion of the transfer payment would put our health care system at risk.

Bennett, who hopes to replace current Liberal MP Barry Campbell, criticized the provincial Conservative government for closing hospitals without putting support systems in place first.

Other key issues locally and nationally are jobs and achieving a balanced federal budget, she said.

"We have two options: to throw our arms up and walk away or to roll our sleeves up and try and make things better," said PC candidate Peter Atkins, a 32-year-old City of Toronto firefighter who was a delegate to the PC Party of Canada's national policy conference last year.

While jobs may be the number 1 issue nationally, in St. Paul's, he has found health care to be a more pressing concern.

In an interview, Atkins raised the issue of prosecuting war criminals, which came to his attention largely because of the recent 60 Minutes segment on the issue. "I don't think we'll ever be able to right this wrong, but I think we should try," he said.

Michael Halewood, the NDP candidate, cited jobs and youth unemployment as major issues "everywhere," but said Bennett's candidacy put more of a "spin" on health care in St. Paul's.

"Our fear," said the 33-year-old lawyer, "is that the Liberals will be using [Bennett] to legitimate their cuts to health care. The current federal government has made "unprecedented changes to Canadian health care, both in terms of surrendering its ability to enforce national health care delivery standards and in terms of the overall cutbacks," he said.

Proposed tax cuts by other parties "just mean more bad news for health care, education and job creation," says Halewood, a first-time candidate.

During last week's televised leaders' debate, Tory leader Jean Charest "should have been challenged directly" on the efficacy of creating jobs through tax cuts, said Halewood.

Reform party hopeful Francis Floszmann, a 61-year-old lawyer, believes the three main issues in St. Paul's are taxation, crime and national unity.

"As soon as the deficit is gone, we've got to start to reduce the tax level," said Floszmann, a native of Hungary who came here as a refugee student in 1957. A member of the Reform party since 1992, he worked for the local association as vice-president and acted as official agent at the last election.

Floszmann decided to enter the race because he'd "had enough of the big government, high taxes, crime, sidestepping of issues and the rhetoric." He believes a vote for Reform will prevent the Bloc Québécois from "getting back into the Opposition. We don't want somebody in Opposition who advocates the breakup of the country."

Other candidates in St. Paul's are Daniel Widdicombe, Canadian Action party; Don Roebuck, Green party; Fernand Deschamps, Marxist Leninist party of Canada; and Neil Dickie, Natural Law party.

Drabkin making another attempt

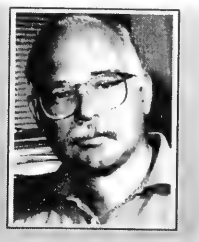
By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Neil Drabkin, the Progressive Conservative candidate in Montreal's west-end Pierrefonds-Dollard, is reminding the riding's sizable Jewish population of all he and former MP Gerry Weiner did in Ottawa to further the community's interests.

Pierrefonds-Dollard

Drabkin, 35, who was senior policy adviser to Weiner while he was a Mulroney cabinet minister from 1984-93, is taking a second shot at a House of Commons seat. He is courting the vote of the approximately 11,000 Jews in the riding, reminding them of his personal role in pursuing suspected Nazi war criminals, the multiculturalism grants to Jewish causes and his battle against Holocaust deniers.

Drabkin, an immigration lawyer, will need the Jewish vote. Incumbent Liberal Bernard Patry garnered over 65 percent of the vote in 1993, with Weiner placing third behind the Bloc Québécois. Drabkin ran for the Tories in Mount Royal then, too, also coming third.



The Kirshner File will return after the federal elections.

Drabkin and Patry, a 54-year-old physician and former suburban mayor, differ on the most important issue in this campaign. For Drabkin, it's national unity. "I decided to run when I saw Jean Chrétien tell a Quebec anglophone during the town hall on CBC that, if he feels threatened, to move elsewhere.

"I'm a proud Jew, born and raised here, and I intend to fight to keep Quebec part of Canada," he said. "Everything else is inconsequential."

For Patry, the main issue is the economy and he is playing up the government's success in reducing the deficit. "When the Liberals came to power, the country was near bankruptcy, the deficit was over $40 billion. We've been able to restore confidence in our economic future."

He's also emphasizing the government's integrity, saying it has kept 90 percent of the promises in the party's Red Book.

Patry hedged on offering a clear opinion on the unity resolutions passed by some municipalities, including Dollard-des-Ormeaux and Pierrefonds.

"I don't think of them as 'partitionist.' They just want to remain in Canada...It's much too soon to talk about partition because we haven't lost the battle yet."

Drabkin sees these resolutions as a consequence of the sense of "abandonment" and lack of leadership federalists feel in Quebec.

As far as Drabkin is concerned, Patry has been silent on national unity and that echoes Chrétien's lackluster performance, in his view. He believes Conservative leader Jean Charest is the only one who

Rabbinic Reflections

Acts of kindness

By RABBI RONALD WEISS

As Jews, we are required to develop the attribute of chesed and incorporate acts of lovingkindess within our nature. Being kind and sensitive to the needs of others is one way of emphasizing the importance of this moral and ethical value; we demonstrate our concern for and involvement with those around us — individually and collectively — as a means of improving the society in which we live.

Perhaps one can see a reference to this teaching in the Torah portion this week. In Parshat Behar, we are told: "Do not give your money on interest and do not give your food for which one will have to give increase." [Leviticus 25:37].

As is well known, the taking of interest violates one of the laws in the Torah. This prohibition is of such importance that we are told of a midrash which states that on the Day of Judgment, all sins a person has committed will be presented for debate between accusing and defending angels, with the exception of the sin of taking interest. For this sin, we are told, there will be no deliberation, just immediate condemnation.

Why should the commandment against the taking of interest be seen so harshly by the midrash? It would seem that the loan of money to one in need is clearly an act of chesed. However, when the loan is given only on interest, the act of generosity and goodwill is transformed. Chesed, where the giver is motivated by concern for the welfare of the recipient, disappears and in its place is greed, where the giver is prompted to action by the prospect of his own personal gain.

Clearly kindness should be done with an altruistic intent, without regard to receiving compensation. If one has the opportunity to lend money interest-free to a person truly in need, and instead charges the recipient for the use of his money, the lender fundamentally changes the nature of the situation. The opportunity to perform the mitzvah of chesed has been perverted. No longer can these circumstances be described in terms of chesed, as it is now a business transaction.

I think that this may be why the midrash views the sin of taking interest so severely. If one accepts the opinion which teaches that the world was created to make possible the performance of chesed, any diminution of this essential characteristic is deemed worthy of immediate condemnation.

We do not claim to be angels, and often our survival in G-d's world requires that we do many things for ourselves. But the things that we do for ourselves should not be to the exclusion of what we can do for others.

If we see the taking of interest as an act that diminishes chesed in the world, one can see why it would be prohibited by the Torah. However, we should come away from this teaching with a renewed commitment to treat all people with kindness and sensitivity.

Chesed does not mean simply responding appropriately when one sees a need. It means anticipating another's problems and providing a solution.

Would that we all worked at developing this quality.

Accepting self-expression

By ARON TANNY

Several months ago, I casually asked my father how he would feel if I were to pierce my eyebrow. His reaction was calmer than I had expected, but the answer was basically: "Not as long as you are living in my house."

My father is a religious man and has a firm belief in Judaism. But the exchange left me with several questions. The basic issue that I began pondering was: How does Judaism feel about teenage rebellion? Is it permitted? Is it accepted? I decided to investigate.

In this specific situation, I am using the word "rebellion" to mean issues such as outrageous dress styles, hair dyeing, body piercing. These examples can be found in the hallways of most secondary schools, including the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), where I am a student. I wanted to discover what Judaism's views were about some of the activities in which teenagers may be involved.

For my investigation, I first spoke to a peer at CHAT.

"The issue is more about how Judaism feels in regard to self-expression," she said, and went on to explain that she personally felt Judaism has little tolerance for those who step out of the accepted mainstream. She herself has no interest in having blue hair or a lip ring, yet through her years of Jewish education she had formed this view.

"Rabbis are not going to be extremely pleased with teenagers who wear outrageous clothing or dye their hair. They would see it as disrespectful," she concluded.

In the Torah, I found few if any instances that deal with this issue. It is noticeable, however, that those who in the past went against the norm were looked down upon. This was true in the case of Esau, who was depicted as a rebellious child, and was not accepted as a part of society. As well, there was Ishmael. Abraham had many difficulties with Ishmael, as he was also a rebellious child, and therefore Abraham left Ishmael and his mother in the desert to fend for themselves. Esau and Ishmael were segregated from society because of their behavior, and this somewhat expresses the Torah's views concerning those who are rebellious.

"There is the commandment: Honor thy father and thy mother," said a rabbi from Beit Haminyan Synagogue, to whom I spoke. "Teenage rebellion has a lot to do with rebelling against their parents, and this shows a lack of respect and a lack of honor. What is the purpose of blue hair or a ring through your nose? The Torah would not be accepting of teenagers indulging in such actions. It is a form of mutilation of the body. There is no room for this in the Judaic view."

The forms of rebellion that I looked into all involved the outward appearance, yet this is generally a reflection of what the teenager feels inside. It may stem from angst or confusion or simply the need to shock or to be different. Judaism, it seems, does not to support such actions, as they display disrespect and a lack of care for the body. The idea of self-expression seems to hold little importance or value. Teens do rebel and their beliefs might conflict with the urge to avoid conformity.

"Teenagers experience a lot of confusion, and they may even rebel against their religion in terms of their dress or outer appearance. Judaic law recognizes this and understands the need to be accepting as long as the adolescent does not lose their attachment to their faith," the rabbi said.

"Judaism feels that expressing yourself is welcome, yet doing outrageous things to yourself in order to express your individuality is unnecessary and disrespectful. Rebellion can be an inner thing. Teenagers have that right to question and become their own people, yet they should not be piercing various parts of their anatomy in order to accomplish this."

Self-expression is something I greatly value. I admire it in myself as well as in others. I place my individuality on a higher level than I place my ties to Judaism. I feel it is important for someone to determine who they are before allowing their religion to dictate their life style. Judaism's inability to accept self-expressive acts is troubling to me. I see these acts not as desecration, but as a form expressing oneself outwardly and artistically.

Judaism attempts to enforce conformity to its laws and customs and this only stifles creativity. It is important to be Jewish and have a strong connection to our faith, yet I believe it is even more important to act and look the way we want. Teenage rebellion plays a prominent part in forming who we are as individuals. Our religion should have meaning to us, yet we must first be able to establish who we are as people in order to discover the role that our religion has in our lives.

Biography of Jesus

The Gospel According To The Son*, by Norman Mailer (Random House, $31).

Hundreds of books have been written about Jesus, about every aspect of his life and ministry. Yet we know very little about him as a historic personality. The four accounts of his life in the Christian Bible are tendentious and often contradictory. The famous reference from Josephus is probably a Christian interpolation; and the comments about him in the Talmud are fragmentary and polemical.

For more than 200 years — ever since critical analysis was first applied to Biblical literature — scholars have attempted to write an objective biography. These lives of Jesus have been as different and varied as the temperaments and interests of their authors. Some of them have depicted Jesus as a fiery prophet and social reformer, some as a personality with a simple message of charity and love for his fellow man, some as a self-proclaimed messiah, some as a supernatural figure with miraculous powers of healing.

Albert Schweitzer, who, long before he went to Africa as a medical missionary, achieved an international reputation as a Christian Bible scholar and theologian. In his famous book, The Quest for the Historical Jesus (1906), he reviewed and evaluated these attempts at writing an objective biography of Jesus. Schweitzer's conclusion — which has come to be almost universally accepted among students in the field — is that the quest must necessarily end in failure.

He maintained that the sole sources upon which the historian can draw, basically Christian Bible accounts, are so contradictory, so encrusted with legendary accretions, so influenced by the theological preconceptions of their authors, that it is impossible to attain any definite and certain historical knowledge.

Norman Mailer, one of the esteemed writers of our time, approaches the life of Jesus in an imaginative and unique manner. He sets down what purports to be Jesus' posthumous autobiography. Jesus tells his own story. He speaks for himself. He says, "I would hope to remain closer to the truth than Mark, Matthew, Luke and John, who were all eager to enlarge their fold."

Mailer's account is largely a paraphrase of the familiar material with a number of deviations — some trivial, a number significant. What are these? Jesus and his family are Essenes, some of his earlier followers are homosexual, the Devil is a constant and wily adversary, Judas betrays Jesus because he believes that he has become enmeshed with material concerns and has forgotten the plight of the poor. Most importantly in Mailer's account, Jesus doubts God's omnipotence. On the cross, he muses, "My Father was only doing what He could do. Even as I had done what I could. So He was truly my Father. Like all fathers He had many sore troubles, and some had little to do with His son. Had His efforts for me been so great that now He was exhausted?"

Why did Mailer, at 74, decide to write this kind of book? In a recent interview he confided that the Gospels are boring and inadequate and that the time was ripe for a retelling of the story.

The Gospel According to the Son written in a brief and simple fashion, displays something of Mailer's narrative skill and is not without flashes of insight. This pastiche of the old and new, however, will not long endure. It is destined to take its place on the dusty shelf with all of those other abortive attempts to bring to life the enigmatic and elusive carpenter from Nazareth.

Israeli archeology on the WWW

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Anyone who has ever visited Israel knows that the most common profession in the country (after amateur politician) is amateur archeologist. Well, just because you don't live in Israel doesn't mean you can't dig through Israel's past. But instead of a shovel and sunscreen, all you need is a connection to the Jewish Highway.

The first place to stop for the armchair archeologist is at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs' Archeology Hotlist [http://www.israel.org/sites.html#arch]. There you'll find links to several attractive sites such as Israel Archaeology from the Air, and Israel's Archaeological Treasures. For a good overview of archeology in Israel over the past 150 years since Frenchman F. De Saulcy began his excavations of the cave of tombs in Jerusalem, see [http://www.israel.org/mfa/ariel/archeol.html].

At Archeological Excavations in Israel [http://www.israel-mfa.gov.il/archdigs.html] you'll find a comprehensive listing of dozens of current digs (many of which have links to their own Internet home pages.) For example, volunteers are welcomed to Hazor http://unixware.mscc.huji.ac.il/~hatsor/hazor.html] in the Galilee during the summer months. (By the way, breakfast at Hazor is served at 4:15 a.m.)

If you prefer a dig that's a bit different, how about the Underwater Excavations of Herod's Harbor at Caesarea [http://meguma.earthsciences.dal.ca/~reinhard/CaesareaHome.html]? There, archeologists are working on the harbor which was commissioned and built by Herod the Great in 21 BCE.

Now that you've visited a few digs, have a stroll through some museums and universities which specialize in archeology. At Jerusalem's Israel Museum [http://www.imj.org.il/archaeology/], you can travel from the Old Stone Age (Paleolithic) through to the Late Islamic Period to learn about the numerous inhabitants of the land of Israel and the artifacts they left behind. Not quite as famous is the Kibbutz Ein Dor Archeological Museum [http://www.geocities.com/Athens/3603]. The permanent exhibit focuses on the history of the Lower Galilee and boasts a unique burial coffin constructed from two clay storage jars.

Ironically one of the most alluring archeological sites for Israelis isn't found in Israel. Petra in south Jordan is a city carved in pink and salmon rock. [http://www.iiconsulting.com/jordan/petra.html].

The 2,000-year-old capital of the Nabataean Arabs has become one of the most popular destinations for Israelis in Jordan.

Of course, you don't have to dig very deep in Israel to find a controversy or two. One of the largest disputes is whether the Tanach's stories can be verified through archeology — or whether believers in the Torah should care about archeology at all. Hershel Shanks, editor of the Biblical Archaeology Review asks "How reliable is the Bible? The answer is it has a sound historical core. What is heating up now is an academic battle between those who deny this and those who affirm it." [http://home1.gte.net/eweiss/arch.htm].

So whether you're a Yigael Yadin [http://www.aw.com/gb/authors/silberman/aprophet.html] or an Indiana Jones [http://us.imdb.com/cache/title-exact/81885], there's a wealth of archeological information to uncover on the Internet.

If you do a little digging.

Rikudiyah '97 pays tribute to 100 years of Zionism

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 400 students from 16 Toronto-area Jewish schools recently danced together on one large stage, spanning an entire gymnasium floor.

They were participating in Rikudiyah, the Israeli folk dance festival for children, held last week at the main gymnasium of York University. All the children performed the same dances simultaneously on the gym floor, with teachers from their schools leading them in the dances.

An estimated 1,100 spectators were on hand for Rikudiyah '97 whose theme this year was a celebration of 100 years of Zionism, with dances commemorating the first International Zionist Conference held in 1897.

Teme Kernerman, the director of Rikudiyah since its inception 26 years ago, said this year's event reflected a mix of music and dance styles brought to Israel by the pioneers who originated from a number of different countries.

Kernerman researches and creates dances to fit the particular theme of Rikudiyah and then visits the schools to teach the dances to the teachers s prior to the performance, she said. "I love Rikudiyah. To see the children enjoying Israeli dance is worth all the effort."

She stressed that one of the most important aspects of Rikudiyah is that the children get to perform for an audience without the pressure of being on stage.

"They're enjoying themselves. They're getting excited about dance. Dance belongs in the schools. It's part of our heritage and culture. Today in Israel, the country is dancing."

She noted that dance has long been part of the Jewish heritage and can be traced back to biblical passages.

Kernerman, a recipient of the Ontario Arts Council award for her contribution to folkdancing, is the coordinator of the senior adult services and folkdancing at the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC). She is also the director/choreographer of the BJC-based seniors dance troop, the Chai Dancers, who opened the program with the premier performance of Shtetl Sher, based on one of the oldest forms of shtetl dances.

United Synagogue Day Schools' (USDS) Bayview branch and Bialik Hebrew Day School gave featured performances.

Presented by Ronit Eisenman, the USDS dance, Hey Daroma l'Eilat (Let's go south to Eilat), was created by student performers Katherine Devlin and Elana Hager, who were inspired by Ben Gurion's efforts to settle the Negev.

Bialik's dance, Fun After Work, was directed by Rivka Atzmony. It recalled the days of the chalutzim, who rose early, worked long, hard days and then danced late into the night.

The Rikudiyah is sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts at the BJC and the Board of Jewish Education (BJE). Opening greetings were given by Dorothy Shoichet, president of the Koffler Centre and Rabbi Irwin E. Witty, executive director of the BJE.

Rabbi Witty said the Rikudiyah is one of a series of inter-school activities that bring Jewish children from different schools together. "It is this type of effort that the BJE as a community agency seeks to foster."

The participating schools were: Bialik, B'nai Shalom Hebrew School, Leo Baeck Day School the Downtown Jewish Community School, Bet Sefer Solel, Holy Blossom Temple Religious School, Temple Kol Ami, Richmond Hill Hebrew School, Hamilton Hebrew Academy and The Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, as well as three branches of both USDS and Associated Hebrew Schools.

Book educates, entertains children about Canada

By PAMELA SWEDKO
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A new book, Crazy for Canada, is an entertaining way for kids to learn about the country.

"Its a catalyst for understanding Canada, but its a fun book," says author Noa Schwartz, 25, who teaches language arts and social studies at United Synagogue Day School (USDS).

The concept took shape when publisher Aaron Zevy of Tumbleweed Press approached Schwartz, showed her the drawings of the character, Lester B. Beaver, and asked her to write the text.

With artist Susan Tebbutt's clay pictures and Schwartz's verse, Lester B. Beaver takes young readers across the provinces and teaches them about the country.

The book is filled with "Did you know?" items, such as, "Did you know that the first Stanley Cup was won by the Montreal Amateur Athletic Association in 1893?"

Schwartz believes that when kids listen to rhyme, it is easier to understand and remember information.

Crazy for Canada made its debut recently at a USDS book fair, where Schwartz read from her book. A mini-version of the book is scheduled to be in department stores across the country by Canada Day, as well as a cuddly Lester B.

Her next book called Old Times, set to be released in January 1998, is a story in verse about a boy whose grandfather is suffering from Alzheimer's disease.

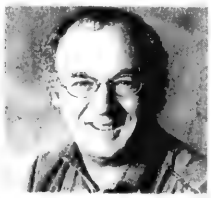
גידי קורן וחברים

העיקר הבריאות:



כתב העת הבריטי "אקונומיסט" דירג את ישראל שניה בעולם במצב הבריאות של תושביה. "מצב בריאות" הוא דבר מסובך לחשב, כי צריך לכלול מה קורה לתינוקות, למבוגרים, לזקנים,וכדומה. בדרכה למקום השני גברה ישראל, על פי ה"אקונומיסט" על כל מדינות העולם, מלבד שבדיה. העיתון מציין בפליאה שישראל הצליחה לשמור על מצב בריאות טוב כל -כך למרות מלחמות, הגדלת האוכלוסייה פי 5 מאז הקמתה, ולמרות המשך הטירור, שגורם לאנשים להיות בחרדה מתמדת. מדהים לחשוב על כך שבישראל מעשנים הרבה יותר מאשר במדינות מתוקנות-והדבר אינו משפיע על התמונה הגדולה. לעומת זאת - בישראל אין כמעט בעיות של שתיית אלכוהול, שגורמת לתחלואה ותמותה בממדים ענקיים בארצות המערב. ועכשיו משהו שקשור לתחום שלי: בישראל אחוז אלה שמקבלים חיסונים בילדות הוא מעל לתשעים, דבר שמונע המון צרות. זה קשור לכך שמדובר במדינה קטנה בשטחה ובמערכת טיפות חלב מעולה, אם הייתי צריך לתת צל"ש לדבר אחד שיש בישראל ואין, למשל בקנדה או בארה"ב , אלה הן אחיות טיפת חלב שמלמדות אימהות איך להניק, שמזהות בעיות לפני שהן הופכות לקטסטרופה, והולכות לבתים ומזהות עוני, ABUSE , ומה לא. איך זה שבקנדה אין טיפות חלב ואחיות טיפת חלב! נורא פשוט! רופאי הילדים נוטים לראות את כל הילדים ואפילו נותנים להם חיסונים. זה טימטום אמיתי, כמובן, כי לשום רופא אין את הזמן והסבלנות של אחיות טיפת חלב, ומדוע לעזאזל צריך רופא לתת חיסונים! זהו בזבוז זמן וכסף. נעדות אמריקניות חזרו והתריעו שזה בזבוז כסף וזמן, אך רופאים בארה"ב (וגם כאן) הם קבוצת לחץ רבת כוח. חזרה לישראל: אז אם המצב הבריאותי כל כך טוב, איך זה שכולם מקטרים ושהעיתונים מודיעים כל יום ש"מערכת הבריאות בהתמוטטות"!

יצחק מרדכי - לתת ולא לקחת.:

פיקאסו הצעיר :

במוזיאון האמנות של וושינגטון מוצג פיקאסו הצעיר, שציוריו מגיל שתיים עשרה ועד עשרים וארבע ממלאים שלוש קומות. אלה הן השנים שבהן צייר פיקאסו את העיניים עדיין במקום הנכון וגם שאר חלקי הגוף היו במקומם. אחר-כך, תוך שנתיים שלוש, התחילה התקופה שיצרה את הסגנון הייחודי שלו. מה אני אגיד לכם - בשבילי אחת הבעיות הגדולות בציור מודרני היא להאמין שלצייר יש מושג איך לצייר. אחרי שרואים איך צייר פיקאסו בצורה נפלאה בגיל שתיים עשרה, זה בהחלט נותן לו קרדיט להתחיל אחר כך ליצור סגנון משלו.

הכניסה לכל המוזיאונים הלאומיים בוושינגטון היא חופשית. זה אומר שהממשלה משקיעה מליונים רבים לאפשר לדלי האמצעים להיחשף לאמנות. רק תחשבו כמה עולה לאסוף ולהעביר את כל הציורים של פיקאסו, וכמה עולה הביטוח! בהחלט יפה שהאמריקאנים מאפשרים לאזרחיהם כניסה חופשית למוזיאונים, אבל למה לכל מליוני התיירים! ואם הם מאפשרים לעניים להיכנס למוזיאונים, לא הגיוני יותר לאפשר להם קודם להיכנס לרופא! (בארה"ב יש 40 מליון איש ללא ביטוח רפואי). אבל שישאר בינינו.

TORONTO — Oren Cainer has always wanted to be a firefighter. The Grade 8 student recently had the opportunity to learn about life at the fire station as part of an innovative day-long job shadow program at Associated Hebrew Schools.

About 150 students, from both Hurwich and Danilack branches, took part in the program instituted eight years ago as part of the Grade 8 curriculum.

School counsellor Gail Freeman designed the program after attending a conference on Career Days. "I wanted to cover more occupations, and I wanted everyone to have fun," she said.

None of the dozen or so students interviewed for this article expressed delight at having the day off school or the opportunity to sleep later than usual. Rather, they all enthused about their day on the job and what they had learned.

Oren Cainer, Ashley Levinson and Daniela Boles toured the Vaughan fire station at 9290 Keele Street in Maple, learned about fire safety, the features of a fire truck and what goes on behind the scenes. They also tried on firefighters' uniforms and found out why they're important.

"We learned a lot, and it was fun," said Oren. The students agreed there's more to a firefighter's job than meets the eye.

Their peers had a wide variety of experiences: a small group tagged along with a cargo pilot; some of the others spent the day with, respectively, a pediatrician, a cardiologist, a radiation oncologist, dentists, journalists, lawyers, a makeup artist and a physiotherapist.

A Royal Ontario Museum curator, a computer systems analyst, a City-TV sportscaster, the company manager for the stage show Ragtime and even the mayor of Markham got into the act, sharing their workday with the young teenagers.

All the adults were quizzed in detail about aspects of their jobs such as responsibilities, prerequisites, working conditions and opportunities.

The students were "very well informed and prepared to ask very intelligent questions," said acting captain Larry Crang of the Vaughan fire station.

Students Daniel Markin and Josh Freeman joined The CJN for the day, spending part of the time collecting material for this article.

Aaron Goldstein shadowed guitar-maker Sheldon Shwartz. Because he likes guitars, he wanted to see how they were made "first-hand."

Amanda Dunec thinks she might want to become a dentist like her father Arthur. Although she admitted her first choice was to spend the day with the Toronto Blue Jays, she likes going to her dad's office and spent the day shadowing him with classmate Ariella Goodman.

Deborah Velsher's day at the Doncaster Animal Clinic, observing animal examinations and surgery, "sparked an interest in medicine. I like animals, and I thought it would be interesting."

Veterinarian Allen Gignac advised Deborah and others thinking of pursuing a veterinary career to get related experience working with big and small animals and to do "very well" in school.

Jonathan Laski, who joined fellow students Eric Sacks and Gila Ashtor at Gâteaux-Gil Cakes (owned by Gila's mother Alla), said the program was a beneficial experience. "It was fun. We got a better understanding of how things are made at the bakery."

Although he had never considered a career as a pastry chef, his new understanding of what it involves will make it possible for him to make better-informed career decisions in the future, he believes.

The intention of the program is "to expose students to the work world and the world outside of school, to allow students to explore different careers and for students to learn and practice interpersonal skills outside of school," said Jerry Rosenfield, Associated's general studies principal for its junior high division.

The experience didn't end when the day was over. Students were to report back to their class about their experience, with their report counting towards their social studies mark.

Drabkin running

can "face up" to Lucien Bouchard. "Before the referendum, [Charest] gave his heart and soul, while Chrétien sat on the sidelines."

Drabkin is proud to say that he was responsible for drafting the order-in-council that stripped Jacob Luitjens of his citizenship, the first alleged war criminal so dealt with in this country. "My only regret is that in 1993, there were seven or 10 other cases ready for denaturalization."

On this issue, Patry commented that he "fully agrees with what the Jewish community is doing...There's no place in this country for war criminals."

Asked if he felt the government was stalling, Patry replied. "This is not my file...It's coming."

He said he favors the setting up of an international tribunal to hear war crimes cases.

Bloc Québécois candidate Normand D'Ambrosio, 48, an industrial relations consultant, has no illusions about winning. He says he'll be happy if he can maintain the 10,000 votes the BQ garnered in 1993.

A Parti Québécois member since 1969, this is his first run for public office. "But I'm not quitting my day job," he joked. Nor does he make any pretense that he is familiar with the specific concerns of the riding's electorate, which is largely anglophone and ethnic.

"I can understand anglophones' strong emotional bond to Canada, but the ethnic population...like every country, we would like the people to be part of the mainstream," he said. "It's disappointing [that they identify with Canada], but they are free."

D'Ambrosio said he will not make any overtures to the Jewish community. "I don't think I'm that important that they would be concerned with me."

Carrying the New Democratic Party's standard is David Lyons, 24, a student. He hopes he can profit from what he sees as the Liberals' shift to the right and public grumbling over cuts in social spending.

He's making few promises, but one thing he has pledged is to introduce a private member's bill for what he considers a fairer tax system — higher taxes for those with $100,000-plus incomes and for corporations.

A native of Windsor, Lyons moved to Montreal a year ago. He's been active in the gay rights movement and in helping AIDS patients, as well as environmental issues.

Lyons said his first choice is a united Canada, but if Quebecers voted for separation, even by a 51 percent majority, he would support their choice.

Debate in Vancouver

VANCOUVER — More than a dozen Vancouver-area federal election candidates debated social justice, human rights and multiculturalism at a meeting last week at the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver.

The discussion was co-sponsored by the United Chinese Community Enrichment Services Society and Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region.

Rotenberg hopes to add federal riding to his resume

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An interesting fight is shaping up in Eglinton- Lawrence riding, where incumbent Liberal Joe Volpe, who has held the seat for nine years, is facing the Conservative standard-bearer, David Rotenberg, a veteran campaigner who has held both municipal and provincial office.

The other two candidates are

Eglinton-Lawrence

Sam Savona of the NDP, a first-time political contender, and Charles van Tuinen, representing the Reform party. He ran for Reform in the 1993 election, receiving 12 percent of the vote.

The riding's new boundaries, which take in a part of the old St. Paul's constituency, have increased the number of Jewish voters (17,000) from 13 to 15 percent of the total.

Cutting a swath across north Toronto from south of the 401 to Eglinton Avenue, west to Keele Street and east to Yonge Street, Eglinton-Lawrence now includes a new area that runs south along Yonge Street from Brooke Avenue.

The riding is the fifth most affluent in Metro with a large number of entrepreneurs and professionals and a significant element of blue collar workers, according to Volpe, 50, who serves as parliamentary secretary to the minister of health.

"The percentage of homeowners is higher in this riding than any other in the city," said Volpe. "At every door, I'm told that jobs and the security of opportunity in the future for themselves and their children is the big issue in this election."

Keeping the country together is the major issue in this election, according to Conservative candidate Rotenberg, 67.

"[Party leader] Jean Charest, through his tremendous contribution in the referendum campaign, has shown that he can relate to the 'soft nationalists' in Quebec," Rotenberg told The CJN.

Rotenberg served on Toronto city council for 11 years, was a member of the Ontario legislature for eight years, and briefly, a cabinet minister in a former Conservative government.

Volpe is responsible for legislative issues related to health, both in the House of Commons and in the health committee.

Savona, 35, is hoping to become one of the first physically disabled persons to be elected to the House of Commons. Affected by cerebral palsy since birth, Savona has to do his campaigning in a wheelchair with the assistance of an attendant.

Though his speech is impaired, campaign manager Daniel Coburn says Savona can make himself understood in a one-to-one conversation after a few minutes.

Savona, who works fulltime as an event organizer for the Ontario Disability Network, got a late start in the campaign when the original NDP nominee had to pull out.

The lack of jobs for Canadians and the Liberal government's failure to keep its promises on job creation are the chief issues in this campaign, Savona said.

"This is a tough riding. It's been a Liberal fiefdom for so long," said van Tuinen, 43. A millwright at a large glass manufacturer in Scarborough, van Tuinen is running the campaign from his own home to save money.

Though it will increase the number of voters in the riding, he does not think the boundary change will affect his fortunes.

Confident that his party will do better than the 12 percent vote registered last time, van Tuinen says Canadians are concerned about jobs.

"People are getting nervous about employment. Things look better but it's not being correlated to jobs. I'm meeting a lot of people with young kids at home who are unemployed."

Redistribution expands Eggleton's riding

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Who's going to stop Art Eggleton?

Back in 1993, the popular former mayor of Toronto had to face down a court challenge from disgruntled candidate Peter Li Presti, upset that the Big Red Machine overturned his Liberal nomination when Eggleton was parachuted into the riding.

Eggleton shook off the distraction presented by Li Presti, who went on to run as an independent, and garnered 27,150 votes, far ahead of Li Presti's second place total of 3,918. The Tory and New Democratic candidates captured about 4,200 votes between them.

This time around Eggleton is again facing a trio of challengers in York Centre, which has grown following readjustment to include the area west of Bathurst Street from Steeles south to the Don River (just north of Sheppard). The Tory candidate, Anthony Figliano acknowledges that York Centre is one of the safest Liberal ridings in the country but he hopes his message of hi-tech job training, coupled with maintaining the strength and quality of the health care system and social safety net will win him support among the voters.

Candidates for the other two major parties, Mark Berardo of the NDP and Anthony Ayok-Chol of Reform, are going after Eggleton more aggressively. Berardo has called Eggleton a spokesperson for "the corporate agenda" while Ayok-Chol accuses him of being "unethical" for amassing a huge government pension at a time when the public is being asked to tighten its belts.

As for Eggleton, he's going door to door talking to his constituents, listening to their views and responding to their concerns. There's no one dominant issue the voters are concerned about though he says he's gotten more than his fair share of comments about the GST. "It's a job undone," he admits, but the Liberals are working with the provinces to develop a harmonized formula to allow for easier collection of the tax.

York Centre

Berardo, a 24-year-old communications consultant, is most vocal in attacking Eggleton. He points to the proposed development of the federally-owned Downsview Lands and says that despite Liberal promises, the community's views are being ignored. A community committee has been briefed on the proposals but "there's been no consultation, no real community involvement on an issue that's in their backyard," he said.

Community agenda

The community, Berardo continued, doesn't want to have the lands used for a residential development or for a multi-use sports complex. "That's the agenda of developers, not the agenda of the community," he said.

Reform candidate Ayok-Chol, 42, is highly critical of the government for "sitting on the fence" in responding to Quebec over separatist issues.

A former professor of law at the University of Dar-es-Salaam in Tanzania, Ayok-Chol is obtaining a Doctor of Laws degree at Osgoode Hall. He believes that if concepts like distinct society are accepted, "you don't know where it's going to end...It's demographically a mixed group in Quebec."

Ayok-Chol deflected suggestions that Reform had a reputation for intolerance of minorities, saying it was the Liberal government that turned away Jewish refugees fleeing the Nazis and it is the current Liberal who are tightening immigration laws to make it easier to deport people for simple offenses like traffic tickets while failing to deport Nazi war criminals.

Figliano, who manages a company that does sales and research, said giving the economy "room to breath" is a key issue in York Centre. People must also receive the kind of hi-tech training that is increasingly in demand to help them escape the plight of underemployment.

Eggleton, meanwhile, seems to be running a low-key campaign, "responding to what people are raising as their concerns for York Centre." He denies suggestions the Downsview Lands projects would not be good for the riding. The proposed development would created 11,500 permanent jobs over 10 years and 15,000 during the construction phase while adding to the quality of life in the riding, he said.

Though he's not touting it, Eggleton said his work in facilitating completion of the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement has been recognized by some voters during the campaign.

Economy on the minds of riding candidates

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In the riding of Willowdale, Liberal incumbent Jim Peterson faces a challenge from veteran politician Progressive Conservative (PC) candidate Norm Gardner, New Democratic Party (NDP) newcomer Mikael Swayze and Reform's Peter Cobbold. Initially a candidate in 1993, Cobbold contested Don Valley North, now absorbed through redistribution.

Willowdale

A realignment of boundaries in Willowdale has reduced the Jewish population from about 20,000 to 14,000.

Peterson, a lawyer who has served three terms as Willowdale's MP, sees the economy as the key election issue. "There are too many unemployed or underemployed," he says.

While declaring that the Liberal government is beating deficit reduction targets, he concedes that there is more to be done. "Government doesn't create jobs," he emphasizes. "The private sector does." Helping to reduce interest rates and keeping inflation low is creating the climate for business investment and more and better jobs, he says. His party, he adds, is making progress.

He is hearing that people are wary about the impact of the provincially-driven megacity.

Businessman Norm Gardner, Metro councillor for North York Centre and a member of the Metro Police Services Board, zeroes in on "the large number of jobless, the uncertainty of those who are working, escalating bankruptcies."

Gardner, who tallies a long list of Jewish communal activities, sees today's PCs as a party with new ideas coming from the Canadian people, not backroom gurus.

He would push for lower taxes to give more discretionary income. "That would funnel more into the economy and create jobs."

Security and safety is an issue which comes up in his door-to-door canvassing. Gardner would make the Young Offenders Act more stringent, especially for repeat and violent offenders, and rescind the Faint Hope Clause, which grants the possibility of early parole to serious offenders.

Jobs are a priority for Mikael Swayze, a first time contender who has worked in previous NDP campaigns and is completing his PhD in political science.

"Our banks, the most profitable corporations in Canadian history," he maintains, "use tax credits for research into automation allowing them to fire tellers and close branches. When you introduce automation, you don't have to fire people by the thousands."

He attacks "defeatist" Liberal and Tory spending cut proposals. His party would increase the Canada Pension Plan where needed and reverse Unemployment Insurance cuts.

"You have to spend money to make money. It works in the Scandinavian countries."

Cobbold is "disappointed" by media accounts he feels put a racist spin on some "unfortunate" Reform comments.

"I know we are not a racist party," he says, observing that he is a member of a North York Committee on Community, Race and Ethnic Relations.

Cobbold retired from business management in 1995 to increase his involvement in the community and the Reform party. He wants to represent all Canadians. "Joblessness doesn't recognize color, race or creed."

A determined advocate of Reform's "fresh start" platform, he would reduce the size of government, saving $15 billion annually, he says and "create real jobs."

Families would take precedence with child care tax deductions of up to $5,000 per child for parents, including those who care for their youngsters at home.

In his Willowdale rounds, he is encountering too many jobless under 30 and over 50, he says.

Reform will balance the budget by March 31, 1999, he says. By the year 2000, the average family would receive $2,000 in tax relief.

Also running are Don Murray for the Natural Law Party, and Paul Coulbeck for the Canadian Action Party.

Yom Hazikaron/Yom Ha'atzmaut

Message of Jewish unity permeates assembly

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A Yom Hazikaron assembly at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue honored the memory of soldiers killed in the establishment and defence of Israel.

The capacity audience sat silently as haunting prayers, music, poetry, readings and speeches in Hebrew sprinkled with English, expressed sorrow at the loss of some of Israel's finest men and women.

Sponsored by the consulate general of Israel in Toronto, B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, Canadian Zionist Federation and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the message of Jewish unity permeated the program.

Consul general Jehudi Kinar spoke of the soldiers who fell "in order that we and our children may live in a free country — a safe haven for the Jewish people in Israel.

"It is the shared grief expressed here today which demonstrates the unity of the Jewish people," he said.

He noted the irony of the event's being held on Mother's Day. In Israel, he said, many mothers have only memories.

"Let's hope that the 18,530 killed while serving the State of Israel will be the last victims in our efforts to obtain an everlasting peace."

The music that interspersed the ceremony included, Cry To You, They Shall Beat Their Swords Into Plowshares, There are Flowers and Ha'Kotel. Cantor Efraim Sapir chanted K'El Malch Rachamin and Kaddish was recited by Shimon Inbar.

Speaking in Hebrew and English, Rabbi Wayne Allen prayed that the memory of the fallen will "continue to inspire us to perform the deeds that will allow us to celebrate our freedom and independence in peace and tranquillity."

A memorial candle was lit by Tzippi Erez, whose father, Baruch Osherevitz, died in the War of Independence, whose uncle, Meir Ari, was killed in 1973, and whose husband, Lt. Colonel Oded Erez, died in 1975 during an army training maneuver.

"We need to remember that we have something that means more than anything else, at least to me, we have an independent state," she told The CJN.

Shula Ofir, the Habonim Dror and Na'amat shlichah, served as master of ceremonies.

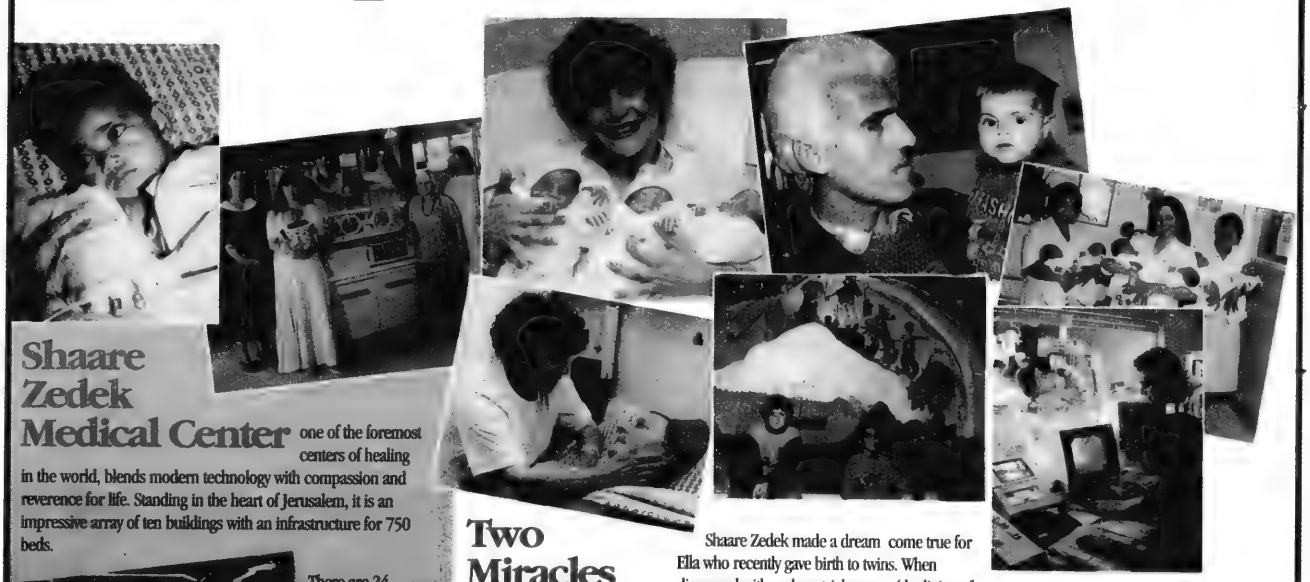
A Hospital With A Heart



Shaare Zedek Medical Center

one of the foremost centers of healing in the world, blends modern technology with compassion and reverence for life. Standing in the heart of Jerusalem, it is an impressive array of ten buildings with an infrastructure for 750 beds.

There are 24 Departments of Medicine, 46 Outpatient Clinics, the Jesselson Heart Institute, the comprehensive Woman and Infant Center, an award-winning Nursing School, and nearly 100 ongoing research projects. Shaare Zedek is a teaching hospital affiliated with the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Albert Einstein School of Medicine at Yeshiva University. Shaare Zedek's services are available to all, regardless of race, religion or financial considerations. The very special dose of love exhibited by the staff, treating the person as well as the disease, has earned Shaare Zedek the appellation "Hospital With A Heart."

Abed Has His Arm Again

As ambulance sirens shrieked, one-year-old Abed was rushed to Shaare Zedek Medical Center, his right arm severed just below his shoulder. For ten precious hours, the limb had been without blood supply.

Abed's parents had placed him in an orange crate while picking citrus fruit - they wanted to keep him out of harm's way! A tractor ran over him and he was rushed to Shaare Zedek for emergency surgery.

A delicate procedure was carried out by microsurgeon, Dr. Binyamina Rosenberg who used a special surgical microscope.

Abed has already regained feeling in his arm and will soon be able to move it again. His parents offer constant thanks to Shaare Zedek for saving their young son from a life of hardship and discomfort.

Have a Heart!

Your support will ensure that we have many more stories to tell. You can make your donation by using the envelope inserted in this newspaper or by calling our office at 416-781-3584 or 1-800-387-3595. We have a full range of cards and certificates suitable to commemorate any occasion.

Two Miracles Two Babies

Shaare Zedek made a dream come true for Ella who recently gave birth to twins. When diagnosed with endometrial cancer (the lining of the uterus) two years ago, she stopped dreaming of babies and started praying for herself.

This type of cancer is normally treated by removing the uterus. As Ella had no children and was only 28 years old, a more conservative course of action was devised

Ella's cancer was removed with her uterus intact. The first miracle took place when doctors were positive that she was completely cured. The next good news - she was now able to consider pregnancy. After fertility treatments, Ella did, indeed, become pregnant and gave birth to two healthy babies.

Gali is Growing

"I work as an ambulance driver, and have contact with many hospitals. The level of care my grandson received at Shaare Zedek is extraordinary!"

These words of praise came from Joe, whose grandson, Gali, was recently treated at Shaare Zedek. Born eleven months ago with severe jaundice which hindered his development, the child was extremely malnourished and apathetic. He was referred to Shaare Zedek when he was nine months old -- very small for his age and hardly crawling.

Gali was diagnosed with neonatal sclerosing cholangitis - a progressive disorder of the intestines. After 16 days of treatment, he was sent home and will need ongoing treatments for his liver.

Gali comes to Shaare Zedek with his grandfather and feels at home in the Pediatric Day Center, quickly crawling over to greet his doctor. Joe is thrilled with Gali's progress, saying, "We praise God for leading us to Shaare Zedek."

Care with Respect and Compassion

Shaare Zedek pioneered a new concept for geriatric care in Israel two decades ago with its comprehensive approach to the needs of the elderly -- acute and chronic hospital care, social services, and geriatric occupational and physical therapy. Activities in the Geriatric Department and Geriatric Institute are infused with extreme sensitivity to the needs of the elderly. They are accorded the greatest respect and dignity, and, wherever possible, are encouraged to continue to make a unique contribution to society.

Follow The Rainbow

The wall leading to the Pediatric Department brings a smile to the faces of our young patients, their families and visitors. It is covered with a bright, colourful painting creating a sense of hope and optimism.

The Children of the Israel Museum recently prepared a mural with birds and animals, a dragon and a castle, trees and flowers, angels and clowns with balloons, and bright rainbows.

Children receive the best medical care possible, accompanied by special patience and consideration. Rooms, serviced by state-of-the-art equipment, are bright and cheerful, with hanging mobiles and colourful wall and ceiling designs.

Back To The Future

For a once-in-a-lifetime adventure, reserve Wednesday, July 23, 1997, when The Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation hosts a day on the world's most recognizable tall ship, the H.M.S. Bounty.

Experience the majesty and the mystique during three-hour sails offering an opportunity to cruise Toronto's harbour and a chance to sail the Bounty. This exact replica was reconstructed in Lunenberg, Nova Scotia, for the 1962 film, "Mutiny on the Bounty."

Service marked by low-key tone

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A low-key, almost informal tone marked this year's religious Zionist observance of Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut, held at Shaarei Shomayim congregation.

Nearly 1,000 people attended the event, sponsored by Bnei Akiva of Toronto, Emunah Women of Toronto, and Mizrachi Organization of Canada.

Rabbi Menachem Gopin, executive director of Mizrachi and co-chair of the evening along with Marsha Kapustin, compared the program's format to what happens when a death occurs.

"At the moment of death, all looks bleak. All we can and should do is to accept G-d's inscrutable will. It is only after a while that we can appreciate what [the person who has died has given them] and thank G-d for those gifts."

Similarly, he said, while at Yom Hazikaron we mourn for soldiers killed defending Israel and for innocent people killed by terrorists. "We praise them for giving us a morasha — a legacy of which to be proud."

After a moment of silence, Cantor Shlomo Sufrin sang the K'El Maleh Rachamim, and Rabbi Roni Barnea lit a memorial candle.

Rabbi Mark Dratch, spiritual leader of the host congregation, said that only those who appreciate the messianic potential of modern events [such as the establishment of the state of Israel] is worthy of redemption.

"There are two types of redemption," the rabbi said, "the redemption of the morning, when we can clearly see G-d's hand, and another one, of the night, when there are losses and death despite successes and victories."

When Jews accept the second kind, "it shows a partnership with G-d — a faith that He can be depended upon even in the night."

He urged the participants to have "more faith, more dedication, more insight. We know that our support of the Zionist state requires hard work, financial support and our prayers. And while we rejoice, and pray, we will have even more reason to rejoice and to pray."

A group from Bnei Akiva Youth gave a brief history of Zionism, including a description of the lesser known figures of Rabbi Zvi Hirsch Kalischer, who wrote and advocated on behalf of settlement in Israel in the 19th century; Rabbi Avraham Yitzchak Hacohen Kook, the first Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi of Israel; and Rabbi Meir Bar-Ian, who coined the phrase which has become the philosophy of the religious Zionist movement — Eretz Yisroel, L'Am Yisroel al pi Torat Yisroel: the land of Israel for the people of Israel according to the Torah of Israel."

The Bnei Akiva Choir, under the direction of Dr. Harvey Erlich, sang a selection of Hebrew songs, as did Cantor Sufrin. The Zemer Orchestra also took part.

Argentinian singer headlines Yom Ha'atzmaut festivities

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Up to 200 people enjoyed the Canadian debut of Alejandra Czarny, the popular singer from Buenos Aires, at the Winnipeg Jewish community's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations held recently at Rosh Pina Synagogue.

She performed a series of songs in Yiddish, Hebrew and Ladino and led the audience in a sing-along of favorite Hebrew and Yiddish numbers.

Czarny, who is is fluent in five languages, grew up listening to Yiddish music and lullabies sung to her by her Polish-born father. (Her mother is Argentinian-born.) She has been performing for 10 years and recently released her first CD in Spanish.

Within the last year, several Argentinian families have settled in Winnipeg and Larry Hurtig, president of the Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC), welcomed them. He congratulated the WJCC on its outreach campaign to the Buenos Aires Jewish community (Hurtig was an integral part of that outreach) and noted that two more families have arrived within the past two weeks.

Another highlight of the evening was a new poem by Noach Witman, Winnipeg's premier Yiddishist, dedicated to Israel on the country's 49th birthday.

Yom Hazikaron / Yom Ha'atzmaut

Dancing in the aisles

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There was dancing in the aisles of the sanctuary of Beth Tzedec Congregation at a Yom Ha'atzmaut concert attended by some 1,000 people.

The concert, which featured Metzitzim Mehaetzba, an Israeli teen song and dance troupe from the Northern Galilee, capped an evening of festivities hosted by Beth Tzedec and sponsored by 25 Jewish groups.

The social hall, festooned with white and blue balloons and Israeli flags, provided entertainment for all three generations of community members who came to celebrate Israel's independence.

Children were entertained by DooDoo the Clown, while their parents and grandparents danced and sang along to Israeli music played by Yitzhak Argaman and his band.

There was an Israeli trade fair and art show and plenty of nosh-erei. People munched on falafel, hummus and pita bread and there was cotton candy for the young and young at heart.

While the mood was festive, the evening began on a note of sadness, as people remembered the fallen Jewish soldiers who gave their lives for the creation and survival of the state of Israel. Their memory was honored at a Yom Hazikaron service led by rabbis Baruch Frydman-Kohl and Roy Tanenbaum, just before the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

Sandra Brown, president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said she was thrilled to see so many different groups in the community come together for both the remembrance service and subsequent the celebration.

Israeli consul general Jehudi Kinar general, said it is difficult "to bridge Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Hazikaron."

To date 18,538 people "have been killed for the sake of having our own country," he said.

He included soldiers who have been victims of terror in the number of casualties, noting that this year alone 328 people "were killed for our freedom."

The concert, the highlight of the evening's events, also included performances by the United Synagogue Day School (USDS) Choir and the children's choir of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation.

The sponsors of the evening included B'nai Brith Canada, Beth Tzedec's men's club and sisterhood; Canadian Jewish Congress, Camp Ramah, Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism, Jewish Theological Society of Canada, the Lodzer Holocaust Centre, Canadian Zionist Federation, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Mercaz-Canada, State of Israel Bonds, United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, United Synagogue Youth, USDS, the Women's League for Conservative Judaism, as well as eight Conservative congregations: Adath Israel, Beit Rayim, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am, Beth Emeth-Bais Yehuda, Beth Tzedec, Beth Radom, Beth Tikvah and Shaar Shalom.

Rabin honored in songs

By DAVID LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Jewish community here celebrated Israel's 49th birthday with Metzitzim Mehaetzba, an Israeli singing troupe whose members hail from the Upper Galilee in northern Israel.

Fresh from a performance in Toronto as part of their first Canadian tour, the group performed in Vancouver in conjunction with Partnership 2000, a program that is trying to create a living bridge between Israel and Jewish communities in the Diaspora.

The concert was also sponsored by the Canadian Zionist Federation, the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, the JCC and the Israeli Folk Dance Society.

The group, whose name means Peeping Fingers (on the map, the region of Israel where they come from resembles a finger), regaled the near-capacity audience at the Norman Rothstein Theatre with a number of up-tempo contemporary Israeli songs that had people singing and clapping along.

The troupe also performed a moving tribute to the late Yitzhak Rabin, as well as a medley of songs about Jerusalem.

They concluded with a medley of chassidic songs and a spirited version of Hava Nagila. The group then led the appreciative audience into the auditorium of the JCC for some Israeli folkdancing to help kick off the second part of Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

Metzitzim Mehaetzba are also scheduled to appear in Denver and San Francisco.

After the concert, a member of the troupe told The CJN that although Vancouver is a beautiful city, being in the Diaspora "gives us a strong sense of where we belong."

Israel's birthday celebrations continued the next day with a lecture by renowned Hebrew University professor Shlomo Avineri. And on June 1, the Jewish community will honor the reunification of the city of Jerusalem with its 11th annual Walk With Israel.

Teen troupe delivers message for peace

TORONTO — The spirited teens who make up the Israeli singing group Metzitzim Mehaetzba delivered on a promise to get their audience up and dancing.

Metzitzim Mehaetzba, the featured performers at a Yom Ha'atzmaut concert held at Beth Tzedec Congregation, dazzled the audience of 1,000 with both new and familiar Israeli tunes.

They delivered a strong message for peace, performing such songs as John Lennon's Give Peace a Chance; Imagine, a song written in memory of Yitzhak Rabin; and Shir Ha Shalom, the song Rabin sang at the peace rally before his assassination in 1995.

Ofer Gavish, the group's musical director, said the performance in Toronto was a dream come true. "My dream was to come back to Toronto," the city, which had been his home for two years when he was an aliyah shaliach from 1991 to 1993, before returning to Kibbutz Yiftah.

Being part of the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations made his return to Toronto extra-special, Gavish said, explaining that the group made a special stop here for the event, en route to Vancouver and Colorado.

All 11 members of the troupe of four boys and seven girls aged 17 to 19 come from the kibbutzim and villages in the vicinity of Kiryat Shmonah in the Northern Galilee. The Upper Galilee Regional Council sponsors the troupe, to promote social links among youth in the area.

Campus-related awards given

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto's second annual awards night, held recently at a downtown campus café, was a dual celebration of student volunteerism and community involvement on local campuses.

JCS, the two-year-old umbrella organization for Toronto Jewish campus groups, is one of the priorities of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said Sandy Brown, president of the latter organization.

JCS director Zac Kaye, who has headed the group since its inception, said the federation "took a courageous decision" and showed tremendous vision in creating a central agency. Toronto has one of the largest campus communities in North America, he noted.

It's also the worst funded, said Arthur Kruger, president of JCS, who nonetheless lauded the campus community as one of the most active ones in North America.

Late-day sunshine filled Sylvester's Loft Café at the University of Toronto (U of T) as 31 campus partner agencies representing a broad spectrum of the community were recognized for their contribution to campus life.

For U of T student Brandon Budd, becoming involved in Koach, a campus offshoot of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, opened new avenues. He and Koach staffer Adam Silver spoke briefly as part of the program.

Stan Till of the National Federation of Temple Brotherhoods, which supports Reform on Campus, presented JCS with a cheque to fund campus programming.

Study Israel, a consortium formed by Canadian representatives of Israeli universities, provides one of several Israel connections to the campus, "an important dimension," noted Kaye. Representative Mark Rubinstein of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University commented on the mutual benefit of the partnership.

From left, Naomi Singer, Ida Jacobovici, Sara Jacobovici and Heidi Chaim are all smiles at Jewish Campus Services' awards night. The two students won the Jacobovici Family Award for Arts and Culture. [Frances Kraft photo]

Other partner agencies — too numerous to list — include United Jewish Appeal on Campus, Jewish National Fund on Campus, Jewish Vocational Services, Aish Hatorah, the Bernard Betel Centre, Friends of Yiddish, the Canadian Zionist Federation and the Israel Experience Centre.

The second segment of the evening, co-hosted by students Michal Kaye and Alicia Richler, honored individual students for outstanding contributions to campus life:

• Eyal Lewin, treasurer of Ryerson Hillel, received the Schwartz Levitsky Feldman Chai award for special involvement in Jewish campus life.

• York University students Naomi Singer and Heidi Chaim received the Jacobovici Family award for arts and culture. They organized a talent show earlier this year, raising $300 for Jewish Family & Child Service to send underprivileged children to summer camp.

• Miriam Gaum, who is graduating from Seneca College, received The Canadian Jewish News award for Jewish Campus Communications. Gaum, who was in the computer graphics imagery program, did the layout and graphic design for the Jewish student publication Images.

• Twin sisters Fran and Teri Rothenberg, of U of T and York respectively, each won a UJA Federation award, Fran for enhancing Jewish identity and Teri for chesed and social justice.

• Tilly Shames, a York University student involved in environmental issues, was presented with the Gropper Family award for outstanding leadership.

• Miriam Birnbaum, a York student, was given the Sidney Mendick memorial award celebrating the pluralism and diversity of Jewish life on Campus. The award was established in memory of Kaye's late uncle.

Four students were also honored by their peers for special contributions on their individual campuses: Ilana Segal, next year's co-president at Ryerson Hillel; Tammy Nisinov, outgoing president, Seneca Hillel; Ilan Gordon, who instituted programs designed to bring Israeli and Canadian students together at York; and Betina Kuzmarov, social action co-chair at University of Toronto's Jewish Student Union.

Two U of T students received endowed scholarships: Andrea Unikowsky was awarded the Emil Fackenheim scholarship; Ira Markus, the Max Rosen scholarship. Both students plan to study in Israel next year.

Tammy Nisinov was also recognized by Seneca College's student government for her work with Hillel. See story in next week's paper.

Human rights hearing opens for Doug Collins

By DAVID J. LITVAK
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The first day of the human rights hearing for North Shore News columnist Doug Collins began May 12, just as the city's Jewish community was gearing up for its annual Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

Collins appeared before the B.C. Human Rights Tribunal over a complaint filed by Michael Elterman, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC), Pacific region, three years ago.

The complaint was in response to a 1994 column Collins wrote for the North Shore News, which has a circulation of about 60,000. Entitled Hollywood Propaganda, the column, among other things, contended that the movie Schindler's List was propaganda and said the Holocaust was "the most effective propaganda exercise ever."

Doug Collins

Collins, long a source of controversy here, dubbed the film "Swindler's List," and suggested Hollywood fixates on the Holocaust because "the Jewish influence is the most powerful in Hollywood."

He also said the figure of six million Jews murdered in the Holocaust is "nonsense," saying he believes the figure to be "hundreds of thousands."

CJC's complaint is under Section 2 of the B.C. Human Rights Code, which prohibits the public expression of hate messages that are likely to expose a person, group or class to hatred or contempt.

Collins is the first person accused by the B.C. Human Rights Council of contravening the province's 1993 Human Rights Act.

If convicted by the tribunal, Collins faces a fine.

At the opening day of the hearing, which garnered national attention, Gregory Walsh of CJC contended that Collins uses his column to denounce Jews, and that his views "are likely to expose Jews to hatred because of their religion."

Walsh added that a reader of Collin's column "can only come to the conclusion that Jews are evil."

CJC is seeking a "cease and desist order" and would like to see Collins and the North Shore News "refrain from publishing articles that would expose Jews to hatred because of their race."

CJC says the freedom of speech and expression arguments used by Collins and the North Shore News amount to allowing people to be exposed to hatred.

A legal defence fund for Collins has reportedly raised over $65,000.

Four British Columbia organizations have been granted intervenor status and are slated to appear before the tribunal: the B.C. Press Council, the B. C. Civil Liberties Association, the B.C. Human Rights Coalition and the Chinese Benevolent Association of Vancouver.

Other organizations present at the hearing include the B.C. Human Rights Commission and the attorney general's office of British Columbia. The hearing continues until June 13.

Survivors share memories with high school students

By WENDY SCHNEIDER
Hamilton Correspondent

HAMILTON — Classrooms where young people listen to Holocaust survivors recount some of the most intimate and painful memories of their lives have become fairly common in Hamilton during the Student Symposium on the Holocaust, sponsored by the Jewish Federation's Holocaust Education Committee.

But Bev Lasky, a member of Hamilton's Holocaust Remembrance Committee, says the awareness that these encounters will become less frequent as survivors age creates a sense of urgency.

The symposium, which is completing its fourth year, was held on May 7 at McMaster University. Each year, a keynote address is presented to the entire group of 350 to 500 students, followed by the sharing of personal stories by Holocaust survivors.

Every year since the program's inception, the word of its impact has spread and this year attendance levels broke all previous records. The idea of a city-wide symposium for high school students originated with Lasky, who had heard about a similar format in Kitchener, where Holocaust survivors were meeting with groups of students and sharing their stories.

Distressed by the rise of Holocaust revisionism, Lasky was convinced that education was the single most effective way to combat ignorance about the Holocaust in the community at large.

This year, students from various high schools representing the city's three boards spent the first part of the morning listening to a keynote address by Casey Korstantje and Andrew Dreschel, investigative reporters for the Hamilton Spectator who wrote a series of articles last year about the activities of a Hamilton-based branch of the Iron Guard, a Romanian fascist group.

The reporters' message to the students was clear: Racism is not just something that happened somewhere else a long time ago. It exists in their own backyard and the quality of their society rests on their finding the courage to fight it in all of its forms whenever it arises.

Afterwards students broke off into small groups and spent an hour with survivors. Frank Junger, a child survivor of Auschwitz, spoke about how the life of a 12-year-old Jewish boy living in a quiet Transylvanian village was insidiously transformed through the degradation of ghettoization, the horrors of starvation and thirst, the agony of transports and the ultimate hell of daily life at Auschwitz. Students sat in respectful silence, listening intently as one horrific event after another was recalled.

Lasky never fails to feel a sense of satisfaction at the completion of a program.

"If these students will one day tell their grandchildren that the Holocaust really happened because they heard, touched and met someone who lived through it, then we've accomplished our goal."

a requirement for immigration. In this case, the applicant clearly stated that she does not want to go to Israel."

McKeown said the IRB's finding was "patently unreasonable," and noted it is "important that potential nationality is not confused with actual nationality."

The ruling is two-pronged: it sets aside the IRB decision and answers a question put before it by Katkova's lawyer, Harvey Savage: "By virtue of Israel's Law of Return, should Israel be considered as a country of reference for all Jewish claimants who apply in Canada for Convention refugee status?"

McKeown's response stands in polar contrast to a 1995 Federal Court ruling that upheld the IRB's denial of refugee status because the claimant was Jewish, and thus eligible for immediate Israeli citizenship.

The judgment by Justice Marcel Joyal stated that Antonina Grygorian, who fled anti-Semitic persecution in Azerbaijan, had "ready and automatic right to another country's nationality," and that Canada's protection "is not a quick fix."

The decision outraged Jewish communal officials, who feared it would be used to justify a modern-day closed-door Canadian refugee policy aimed specifically at Jews.

It also divided the IRB on how to deal with Jewish refugee claimants. Over the past two years, there have been many board rulings granting refugee status to Jewish claimants. But some panels, as community officials had feared, still rely on the Grygorian case. In the Katkova case, panel members said they were bound by the precedent set in the Grygorian ruling.

For Jewish refugee advocates, perhaps the most reassuring aspect of McKeown's ruling rests in a single sentence: "In my view, there is nothing binding about [the Grygorian decision]."

Perry Romberg, national director of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), called the ruling "good news. It puts a hechsher (stamp of approval) on what we've been saying: that Jews have a right to safe haven, other than Israel."

According to Savage, the decision goes further than any other in interpreting the Law of Return as it applies to refugee claims in Canada.

Savage feels McKeown's ruling "replaces" the findings in the Grygorian case, and he hopes that IRB panel members will find it "more compelling."

On the other hand, he cautioned, some IRB panels may still prefer to rely on the earlier decision.

Privately, some immigration lawyers are saying that the IRB must issue official guidelines to its 170 members on how to deal with demands for refugee status from Jewish claimants.

A year ago, John Frecker, deputy chair of the IRB, told The CJN the board only issues guidelines when courts arrive at divergent opinions on the same issue.

Frecker was out of the country and unavailable for comment last week.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) last week called on the IRB to issue guidelines in order to clarify the matter, and urged the federal government not to appeal the Katkova decision to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Congress president Goldie Hershon praised the ruling as "the correct" interpretation of the Law of Return.

CJC says it will raise the issue with the minister of immigration following the federal election.

Anti-racists rally

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — An anti-racist noon-hour rally was held in Winnipeg May 12 outside the Manitoba Law Courts building to demand harsher and faster punishment for hate crimes.

The rally was held to coincide with the bail hearing for one of four alleged white supremacists charged in the beating death of a Winnipeg man in 1991. Matt McKay, James Lisik, Robert Welsh and Garry Kuffner are charged with the beating death of Gordon Kuhtey, who was killed because he was walking alone in an area known to be frequented by homosexual men.

The rally, organized by the Western Anti-Racist Network, was originally intended to coincide with the start of the trial of the four accused. But the case was put over to Aug. 11.

About 100 people from different anti-racist and community groups joined in the protest, which was addressed by Winnipeg city councillor Glen Murray. The group carried placards, shouted anti-racist slogans and left behind some graffiti on a scales of justice statue.

BENQUESUS ELECTED

Jacques Benquesus of Toronto was elected president of the first International Board of Governors of the World Sephardic Educational Centre, Jerusalem (WSEC) at a recent meeting in Miami Beach. Benquesus is president of Or Haemet Sephardic School in Toronto and a leader in the city's Sephardic community. Elected secretary of the board was Sam Serruya, also of Toronto. Recently, a WSEC young adult chapter was established in Toronto, in addition to the existing one in Montreal. With chapters in 12 countries, the WSEC has sent over 15,000 Jewish youth to its Jerusalem centre since its founding 18 years ago. The organization will lead a campaign to expand its outreach programs in local communities and help purchase three buildings in Jerusalem for its programs.

Labor party endorses Palestinian statehood

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Israel's Labor party has decided to formally endorse the Palestinians' right to a state with limited sovereignty.

Labor officials agreed to add the measure to their platform during a party recent convention in Tel Aviv.

The decision came a year after the Labor party decided to drop opposition to a Palestinian state from its platform.

The recognition came with the limitation that the Palestinians could not establish an army or form military alliances with other countries. In addition, the measure said the Palestinians must give Israel's air force access to airspace over the self-rule areas.

In response, the Likud party issued a statement saying the move proved that Labor would succumb to Arab pressures in forthcoming negotiations on final-status issues, which is slated to include the question of Palestinian sovereignty.

The vote on the party platform, which will serve as the basis for Labor positions in the national elections scheduled for the year 2000, came a day after a stormy political showdown within the party.

Knesset member Ehud Barak, the leading contender for the party leadership in next month's primaries, at first objected to the explicit reference in the measure to a Palestinian state.

But the hawkish former Israel Defence Force chief of staff, apparently softened by a victory over outgoing party chair Shimon Peres, ultimately withdrew his objections.

At its opening session, the 3,500 Labor delegates overwhelmingly heeded Barak's call and voted to postpone until September a discussion of whether to appoint Peres to the new position of party president.

Barak, who opposed the proposal, said that bestowing the title on Peres would lead to divisions in the party and create confusion about who was really in charge.

The vote was viewed as a stinging defeat for Peres, who met with close colleagues to assess its aftermath.

He said he had no intention of quitting the Labor party or of taking his supporters to join a national unity government with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Peres added that he would cooperate with the winner of the June primaries, and that he planned to continue pursuing peace with the Palestinians.

Ne'eman acquitted

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A Tel Aviv court has acquitted former Justice Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman of charges of perjury and obstruction of justice.

The court decision could pave the way for Ne'eman to return to that post. It also gave Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu a way to remove current justice minister, Tzachi Hanegbi, who has been dogged by allegations of influence peddling in the appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

Ne'eman stepped down, when then-Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair launched a criminal investigation into allegations that he had obstructed court proceedings relating to the trial of Shas Knesset member Aryeh Deri.

The judges cleared Ne'eman, however, and said that inaccurate information he had conveyed in a court affidavit related to the Deri case was the result of human error.

Though state prosecutors last month decided not to indict Hanegbi for involvement in the Bar-On affair, they found improprieties in his handling of the appointment.

While Netanyahu welcomed Ne'eman's acquittal, it was not clear whether he planned to move to reinstate him.

Hanegbi refused to say whether he planned to step aside to let his predecessor take up the post again.

Officials from across the political spectrum welcomed the acquittal. One note of dissent, however, was voiced by Meretz leader Yossi Sarid.

Pointing to Ne'eman's attack on officials in the Justice Ministry following the decision to launch a criminal investigation against him, Sarid said Ne'eman should not be allowed to resume his former responsibilities.

Swiss fund to aid Holocaust survivors now open

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

BASEL, Switzerland — The special fund established by banks and businesses here for Holocaust survivors is now operative, according to the Swiss Bankers Association (SBA).

In an interview, SBA spokesperson Silvia Matile-Steiner placed its current value at $265 million.

The Swiss National Bank has contributed $100 million to the fund, while Switzerland's three major banks — Union Bank of Switzerland, Credit Suisse and the Swiss Bank Corporation — have donated a further $100 million.

The balance comes from additional Swiss banks ($20 million) and Swiss industry, including insurance companies ($45 million).

Creation of the fund, the outcome of negotiations between the SBA and the New York City-based World Jewish Congress, was announced several months ago.

Described as "an unprecedented breakthrough" by the World Jewish Congress, it is designed to "support persons in need who were persecuted for reasons of their race, religion or political views."

For all intents and purposes, it will benefit mainly Holocaust survivors in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union who were not eligible for restitution during the Communist era.

The fund is managed by a board headed by Rolf Bloch, president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Switzerland. Four of its seven members are Swiss nationals. Two are Israelis — Yosef Burg, former leader of the National Religious Party, and Avraham Hirshon, a member of the Knesset.

Elie Wiesel, the novelist and Nobel Prize laureate, was appointed honorary chair on May 1, but he resigned two weeks ago. A replacement has yet to be named.

Until recently, the SBA — which represents some 450 banks — resisted the idea of a compensation fund on the grounds that it was an admission of Swiss guilt and an intolerable pressure tactic by American Jews.

Swiss banks have been the objects of intense scrutiny and criticism. They have been accused of helping Nazi Germany finance its war effort by buying looted European gold and of treating Jewish bank deposit holders and their descendants unsympathetically and too legalistically after the war.

As a result of this controversy, which clearly damaged Switzerland's reputation abroad, the Swiss accepted a proposal by the World Jewish Congress for a special fund to alleviate the immediate needs of Holocaust survivors.

Initially, Swiss authorities were only prepared to finance it with monies from dormant bank accounts left behind by Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

But after the Union Bank of Switzerland was caught trying to shred wartime archives, Switzerland's three major banks took the initiative in setting up what has ballooned into a multi-million dollar fund.

Though a product of sustained coercion, the SBA puts a benign face on it. Georg Krayer, president of the SBA, claims it is a "grateful remembrance of the fact that Switzerland has been spared battles, occupation by foreign powers and racial persecution."

Krayer's subordinate, Matile-Steiner, said the Volcker Commission, as well as the three auditing firms retained by the SBA, will exhaustively study the issue of dormant accounts.

A joint venture of the SBA, the World Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Restitution Organization, the commission was established a year ago and is led by Paul Volcker, a former chair of the U.S. Federal Reserve.

Volcker, who has been given access to all relevant bank documents, is expected to submit a report next summer.

"We want truth and transparency, in the interest of all Holocaust victims and in the interest of the integrity of our banking system," said Matile-Steiner. "We will accept his findings as the truth."

The World Jewish Congress claims that Swiss banks hold at least $7 billion in unclaimed assets from Jews. But Matile-Steiner disputes that figure, saying that a SBA search has turned up no more than $40 million in dormant accounts.

"We don't know how much belongs to Holocaust victims and survivors."

In the past five decades, she said, Swiss banks have made two payments to Holocaust victims, their heirs, Swiss refugee organizations and Swiss Jewish groups: 16 million Swiss francs in 1946 and 9.5 million Swiss francs in 1962.

"Then there was a long pause," she noted. "No one asked any questions, neither the banks nor Jewish organizations, until about 1994. Everyone assumed the matter had ended."

In reply to queries from Holocaust survivors in Eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, she explained, the Swiss Federal Banking Commission asked the SBA to investigate. "By the beginning of 1995, we realized that the problem has not been solved."

She acknowledges that external pressure, especially from the World Jewish Congress, accelerated the process of accountability which the SBA has since embraced.

Matile-Steiner readily admits that Swiss banks, in the aftermath of World War II, showed a dearth of sensitivity in dealings with Jewish clients who had lived through the Holocaust. It was not uncommon for some banks to ask claimants for death certificates for relatives who had died in concentration camps. "We regret this lack of sensitivity," she said.

She is also sorry that guidelines for the handling of dormant accounts were not issued before 1995. Under the new rules, banks are required to maintain all account records until further notice, and disputes between banks and clients are mediated by an ombudsman who is supposed to be neutral and independent.

In the latest development, the SBA has expressed "unequivocable support" for disclosing the names of pre-1945 account holders.

The concept was recently proposed by British politician Greville Janner, a vice-president of the World Jewish Congress. He suggested that the publication of old Swiss bank legal notices could facilitate the search for dormant funds.

The issue, however, cannot be taken any further until it is discussed with the Volcker Commission, said Matile-Steiner.

In the furor over the behavior of Swiss banks during and after the war, the SBA has received hate mail. But Matile-Steiner downplays it. "We shouldn't overestimate this. We should concentrate on our work."

Rabbis launch program

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The Orthodox rabbinical group that prompted recent outrage from just about every other Jewish religious group in the United States and Canada is now beginning a campaign to bring Reform and Conservative Jews into Orthodoxy.

The effort will involve staffing the Lower East Side offices of the Union of Orthodox Rabbis of the United States and Canada with volunteer rabbis who will respond to the flurry of phone calls and letters the group says it has received since last month, when it declared the Reform and Conservative movements "not Judaism."

The rabbis will help direct people to Orthodox synagogues and rabbis for counseling, said Rabbi Hersh Ginsberg, director of the organization, which claims more than 500 members and proudly describes itself as "right wing."

He said the group has received some 100 letters over the last month, some negative, but the majority were "extremely encouraging to us."

Dozens of Reform and Conservative Jews, he said, are "asking for help" to become Orthodox.

Rabbi Paul Golomb, executive director of the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, said he "can't disabuse people of their opinions created by their own definitions."

The chancellor of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary, Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, declined comment.

Coming to grips with air warfare claim that they are not being aimed at civilians? During the 1991 Gulf War, Dinstein says, the Iraqis fired 42 missiles at Israel. All but a handful were fired toward Tel Aviv.

The Iraqis, Dinstein says, claimed that they were aiming at the Israel's Defence Ministry, which he calls a legitimate military target. But not one missile even came close to the ministry compound.

"This was indiscriminate bombing," Dinstein says. "You have to fire on military targets and ensure that the action achieves its purpose."

Rein Mullerson, a professor of international law at King's College in London, agrees. At TAU's Howard Gillman International Colloquium on Air and Missile Warfare, Mullerson argued that the Iraqi attacks on Tel Aviv and Riyadh were meant to terrorize civilians rather than destroy military targets.

"Expensive, inaccurate and highly destructive weapons will only produce [the] desired effect when hitting soft and unprotected large targets, such as civilians or civilian objects," Mullerson said.

That conclusion, however, would clearly favor the western nations, whose missiles are far more accurate than those in the Middle East. In the Gulf War, the U.S. Tomahawk missile had a reported accuracy of 85 percent, high enough, in Dinstein's view, to allow its limited use to destroy military targets in enemy cities such as Baghdad.

"What if one side has smart bombs and the other doesn't?" Dinstein asks. "Smart bombs might be too expensive, or one side can claim that why should it use smart bombs when the other side doesn't?"

Currently, Dinstein says, international law has not addressed the missile issue. In 1987, Canada, France, Germany, Italy, Japan, Britain and the United States agreed on the guidelines of the transfer of equipment and technology related to missiles, known as the MCTR. This agreement addresses proliferation rather than the use of missiles in war.

So, the questions persist. What about the use of nonconventional warheads? The 1993 Convention on the Prohibition on the Development, Production, Stockpiling and Use of Chemical Weapons and their Destruction, contains the unconditional ban on the use of chemical weapons. This would theoretically mean that a country struck by enemy chemical warheads could not retaliate in kind.

Nuclear weapons, however, appear to have legal sanction. In July 1986, the International Court of Justice at the Hague was asked about the allowance of nuclear weapons. The court's opinion was fuzzy, Dinstein says, but did not rule out their use.

The international court ruled that the conduct of nuclear war is related to the use of force enshrined in the United Nations Charter and that "the use of force that is proportionate under the law of self-defence, must, in order to be lawful, also meet the requirements of the law applicable in armed conflict."

The court added, "However, in view of the current state of international law, and of the elements of fact at its disposal, the court cannot conclude definitively whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons would be lawful or unlawful in an extreme circumstance of self-defense, in which the very survival of a state would be at stake."

Other issues include the legality of anti-missile defence. Could Israel, for example, pre-empt an enemy missile attack and claim it was acting in legitimate self-defence?

It's a question that U.S. officials debated several years ago when approving American funding for the Arrow anti-missile defence system, diplomatic sources recall.

The U.S. experts concluded that the Arrow, which attempts to intercept and destroy enemy missiles in the targeted country, does not pose any legal problems in international law.

But Israel and the United States are working on another missile system that some U.S. experts find problematic. This is the Boost Phased Intercept, in which an enemy missile is destroyed in the first stage of launch.

The result is that the missile debris is scattered on enemy territory. If the warhead of the destroyed missile is nonconventional then the results could be disastrous for the aggressor.

Peace process dead?

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Is the peace process dead? The question is no longer theoretical since the breakdown of Israel's bilateral negotiations with the Palestine Authority (PA) two months ago. The talks collapsed as a result of two factors: Benjamin Netanyahu's decision to build a new Jewish neighborhood — Har Choma — in East Jerusalem and the subsequent Palestinian suicide bombing in Tel Aviv which claimed the lives of three women.

Last month, no less a personage than David Afek, head of the Israeli foreign ministry's political research centre, suggested that the peace process has in fact crumbled.

Last week, following an abortive attempt by President Ezer Weizman to restart the talks, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators met at the home of the U.S. ambassador to Israel to discuss the current situation.

But the two sides remained far apart, and the Palestinians said they regarded the encounter as merely a meeting rather than a fullscale resumption of negotiations.

The growing perception that the peace process is at an impasse is buttressed by the widespread belief that U.S. special envoy Dennis Ross cannot close the increasingly yawning gap between Israel and the PA.

Ross, who successfully brokered last January's Hebron agreement, has run into a brick wall in his effort to get the two sides talking again.

In an effort to rebuild trust in a process that has been repeatedly battered since the signing of the Declaration of Principles in September 1993, Ross has set his sights high.

He has tried to convince the PA to resume security cooperation with Israel, and conversely, to induce Israel to refrain from unilateral actions. At the same time, he has tried to kickstart final status talks, which are a year behind schedule, and to initiate discussions on implementing interim accords.

Ross believes that the present stalemate could trigger a violent explosion of the kind that almost wrecked the peace process last September, when, in reaction to the opening of an archeological tunnel exit in East Jerusalem, Palestinian rioters ran rampant and PA policemen and Israeli soldiers exchanged fire in a series of deadly clashes.

Despite the urgency of today's situation, Ross has been unable to devise a formula which would enable the Israelis and the Palestinians to return to the negotiating table.

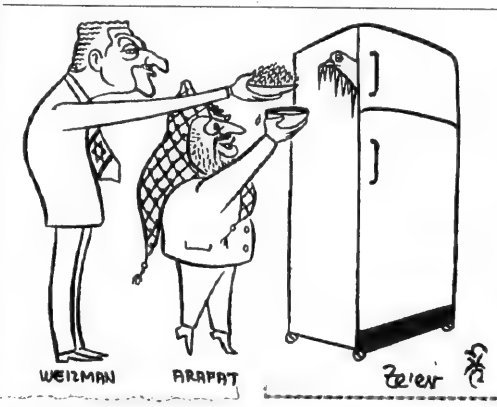
The deadlock is a classic case study in mutual frustration. Israel wants the PA to resume full security cooperation and to prevent terrorist attacks before negotiations are restored. But the PA is unwilling to meet Israel's demands unless it cancels the Har Choma project and stops expanding settlements in the West Bank.

Israel has rejected these conditions, but to soften the blow has eased the closure of the territories and offered the Palestinians a number of concessions. Israel appears ready to build Arab housing in eastern Jerusalem almost immediately and to return the identity cards of some 1,000 East Jerusalem Palestinians who've left the city.

As well, Israel has implied that it is amenable to complying with the final provisions of the Oslo 2 agreement by giving the Palestinians a "safe passage" route from Gaza to the West Bank and by letting the PA use an airport and construct a sea port in the Gaza Strip. Israel has even hinted that it may increase the size of its first deployment, so far not carried out, from Area C in the West Bank.

The Palestinians have not been receptive to Israel's proposals, largely because they leave intact Israel's sovereign claim to East Jerusalem. The PA, though, has agreed to conduct sporadic security cooperation with Israel. In April, the PA helped crack a Hamas cell in the Hebron area which had taken responsibility for the murder of 11 Israelis in the past 18 months.

But even this limited cooperation may not last if, as reported last week, Israel expands the municipal boundaries of East Jerusalem and decides to keep 60 percent of the West Bank in any final settlement with the Palestinians.



The Week in Israel

May 12

• Hezbollah gunmen attacked an army position in southern Lebanon. One Israeli soldier and three members of the South Lebanon Army were wounded.

May 13

• Israel's new ambassador to Jordan, Oded Eran, resigned his post after less than a week on the job. Eran complained that he had not been informed about a secret meeting between Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and King Hussein the week before.

May 14

• Israel's High Court of Justice rejected petitions calling for a state inquiry into the Bar-On affair. The five-justice panel considered separate petitions demanding that the prime minister and justice minister be tried for breach of trust and fraud in connection with the short-lived appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

• Israeli, Palestinian and American officials met at the residence of U.S. Ambassador Martin Indyk to discuss possible ways to break the impasse in peace negotiations. (Talks adjourned later in the week with Israeli and Palestinian views divergent as to their success.)

May 15

• Turkey's foreign minister announced that joint naval exercises with Israel would be held this summer despite recent contradictory statements by Turkey's prime minister.

• Israeli opposition leader Shimon Peres met with Yasser Arafat in the West Bank town of Ramallah. Peres told the Palestinian leader not to give up hope for an eventual Israeli-Palestinian peace.

• The Central Bureau of Statistics reported the cost of living index for the month of April rose by 0.7 percent. Annual inflation now stands at 10 percent.

May 16

• Fierce battles raged in south Lebanon Thursday night. IAF aircraft took part in the action followed by heavy IDF artillery bombardments of the area.

• Police have arrested a Palestinian police officer and a woman in connection with the murder of a Jerusalem Arab who sold land to Jews.

Lag b'Omer: a call for mutual respect

By IRVING GREENBERG
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — In the Talmud, Lag b'Omer —the 33rd day of the counting of the Omer period — is a devastating reminder of a historic catastrophe caused by Jewish divisiveness.

Today, Jewry seems to be heading for a repeat of that disaster.

In a very short period, tens of thousands of Rabbi Akiva's students died. They died because "they did not treat each other with respect," says the Talmud.

What is the connection between lack of respect and loss?

Rabbi Akiva and some of his students proclaimed Simon Bar Kochba, the leader of the Bar Kochba revolt in Judea against Rome, to be the Messiah.

Other colleagues strongly opposed the Bar Kochba rebellion. Rabbi Yochanan Turta mocked Rabbi Akiva, saying, "Grass will grow from your cheeks [meaning, you will be long buried] and the Messiah will not yet have come."

What if the students had dialogued respectfully and learned from each other? Perhaps the messianists would have listened to the others; perhaps the two groups would have come up with a more sober strategy of resistance to the Romans.

Instead, there was a total revolt that brought a crushing defeat and 1,800 years in exile.

Assimilation and Christian proselytizing alike eroded Jewish communities in the first and second centuries. What if Rabbi Akiva's students and the rabbis, who differed widely in their approaches, had admitted that none of them had solved the problems of assimilation and cultural competition?

Using all the different approaches, together they might have reached the masses. Had they been more modest, more open, perhaps they could have overcome the enormous contempt and strident conflict between the scholars' circles and the unlearned people.

Instead, countless Jews were lost, as were many students of the great rabbi.

In this generation, we face a social catastrophe in the making.

The behavior of Orthodox, Conservative, Reconstructionist and Reform leadership is a classic repeat of "they did not treat each other with respect."

Since the 1960s, when North America opened up to Jews in an unprecedented fashion, there has been a "plague' of assimilation.

Instead of recognizing that no one was prepared for such openness and acceptance — and that all traditional systems, not just Judaism, were vulnerable — each group has locked in on its own needs and strengths and written off the others' concerns.

Reform responded to its growing constituency of intermarried with unconverted partners by recognizing as Jewish children born to a Jewish father and non-Jewish mother.

Orthodox objections were dismissed on the grounds that the Orthodox would not accept liberal converts anyway. Yet, Conservative Judaism's rabbinic leadership also rejected patrilineal descent.

In another expression of "lack of respect for each other," Reform's leaders concluded that the Conservative lay people had lower standards than their rabbis, that the lay people were ready to accept patrilineal Jews.

A plague of divorce swept the Jewish community.

Second marriages without benefit of a get, or religious divorce, threatened to create halachically unmarriageable children. To prevent illegitimacy, Rabbi Moshe Feinstein, one of the great Orthodox scholars of the century, ruled that Reform marriages were halachically invalid, thus requiring no get to end them.

However, the solution was based on lack of respect for the Reform rabbinate. It was easier to rule that Reform was an invalid religion than to validate Reform marriages.

Important Reform rabbis such as Rabbi Eugene Borowitz welcomed Rabbi Feinstein's solution, in order that they, in turn, would have full freedom of action. There would be no need to temper their behavior for the sake of Orthodox concerns.

Now the disrespect has boiled up. The Union of Orthodox Rabbis declared that "Reform and Conservative are not Judaism at all, but another religion."

While the mainstream Orthodox leadership disowned the statement, they also are angry at liberal rejections of tradition. Therefore, they did not make an unequivocal, positive statement that liberal movements are legitimate.

Neither theologically nor politically is any centrist Orthodox leader able or willing to publicly respect Reform and Conservative Judaism by asserting their legitimacy.

Now the leadership of the liberal movements has dropped all restraints of language. Jewish Theological Seminary Chancellor Rabbi Ismar Schorsch recently said that the chief rabbinate is "dysfunctional" and its religious courts are "without a scintilla of moral worth."

Reform leader Rabbi Eric Yoffie has described the Israeli rabbinate as "medieval," "extremist," "radical," and "fanatic," and "a disgrace to the Jewish people and its religion."

Rabbis Schorsch and Yoffie both know that they must deepen the spiritual life, education and observance levels of their constituents. They know that positive exposure and contact with the Orthodox community will upgrade liberal Jews in those areas in which Orthodoxy is strongest — learning, observance and community.

But by now, the anger and lack of respect is the overriding connection. Would anybody use such language use vis-a-vis Christians?

In fact, Rabbi Norman Lamm, president of Yeshiva University, and the Agudath Israel of America know that the Orthodox community is weakest in coping with new roles for women and in facing the challenge of social action. They know that Orthodoxy has a lot to learn from the liberal movements in many areas.

But right now, the levels of respect are so low that they cannot admit or even articulate such ideas.

Unless there is a major uprising by all Jews for unity, the Jewish people may be heading for a fundamental schism.

Only spotlighting the forces of divisiveness, generating strong internal pressures within each movement to take other groups into account, and increasing support for active dialogue and joint activity can arrest this slide toward alienation and separation.

This Lag b'Omer, every Jew should pause a moment in silent tribute to the memory of Rabbi Akiva's students who died untimely deaths. Then there should be a second moment of confession and repentance for the coming untimely death of Jewish unity.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its third annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit photographs which relate to the theme celebrating 100 years of Zionism. They must be original photos "shot" by the reader.

Who can enter: Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

How to enter: A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Sept. 8, 1997.

Prizes: The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. The "winning" submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." We may also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Sept. 19, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Oct. 2, 1997. Cheques will be sent shortly thereafter.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Schizophrenia
In The Jewish Community

Researchers at The Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine and other collaborating institutions are conducting a study to understand the biological cause of schizophrenia among Ashkenazi Jews. Both environmental and genetic factors are believed to play a role in determining who is susceptible to the disease. Although schizophrenia does not occur more frequently among the Jewish population, the fact that the Ashkenazi Jewish community evolved from a limited number of ancestors and that they tend to marry individuals from the same ethnic background provides unique opportunities for the genetic analysis.

Ashkenazi Jewish families with TWO or MORE LIVING SIBLINGS who have a diagnosis of schizophrenia or schizoaffective disorder are potentially eligible for inclusion in the study. Travel is not required.

For more information, please contact Dr. Ann Pulver or Gail Ullrich, MSW, toll-free at 1-888-289-4095 or via fax at 410-955-0644 or by mail at The Johns Hopkins School of Medicine, 1615 Thames Street, Suite 205, Baltimore, MD 21231.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I was wondering whether gefilte fish is high in fat and calories?

A. Most people when making gefilte fish use a combination of whitefish, pike and pickerel along with approximately one egg per pound of fish. Therefore a three-ounce piece of gefilte fish (the size of a deck of cards), made with this mixture actually is low in fat and calories. It adds up to only 110 calories and 2.8 grams of fat. A tablespoon of horseradish tacks on only an additional six, fat free calories.

Q. I love strawberries. Now that they are coming into season I am wondering if they are a low calorie choice?

A. Strawberries are a wonderful low calorie choice. One cup contains only 45 calories and provides more than 100 percent of your daily requirements for vitamin C, along with a healthy dose of many other vitamins and minerals. Enjoy!

Q. I am trying to cut down on the amount of red meat that I serve my family, but we do enjoy it. Which cuts of beef would be the leanest choices?

A. Try such cuts as flank steak or chuck, trimmed of all visible fat. If using ground beef always buy extra lean.

Twin sisters gave birth on the same day at Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem.

Twin sisters give birth on the same day

JERUSALEM — Visitors to maternity ward 7150 at Shaare Zedek Medical Center could be forgiven for rubbing their eyes and thinking that they were seeing double — two identical women leaning on pillows in adjacent beds, each holding a small baby.

The women are 27-year-old identical twins, and are pretty hard to tell apart. Revital underwent treatments and became pregnant after six years of hope, and Vered became pregnant without medical assistance around the same time. Revital was very closely monitored and came to Shaare Zedek last month for induced labor. Her twin sister accompanied her for moral support.

Revital was taken into the labor and delivery suites where the birth process commenced. While Vered waited eagerly outside the suites, her waters suddenly broke and she herself was wheeled in.

Even during the birth process, the twins showed remarkable symmetry and their babies registered similar reactions at the same time on their respective fetal monitors. The midwives and obstetricians said they had never experienced anything so strange, even taking into account the special bond between twins.

One sister gave birth in the late afternoon and the other a few hours later. And each gave birth to a healthy girl, the first child for both women.

Crohn's, colitis group ready to hit the streets

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Over 1,000 people of all ages are expected to participate in the second annual Heel 'n' Wheel-a-Thon for the Crohn's and Colitis Foundation of Canada.

The day-long event will be held June 8 at Sunnybrook Park, near Leslie and Eglinton. Participants may choose between an 8-km walk and a 20-km ride, on anything from roller blades to bikes.

The walk will begin at 8:30 a.m., with the official opening at 9:30 a.m. The last participants are expected to leave the starting position no later than 2 p.m.

Day packed with special events

Mort Weisberg, chair of Heel 'n' Wheel-a-Thon, said the day will be packed with special events. Breakfast and lunch will be served; Shoppers Drug Mart is sponsoring a children's' play area, with a maze, face painting and a diaper-changing area; and there will be live entertainment, with bands and line dancing.

Honorary chair is Ontario Speaker of the House Chris Stockwell.

Weisberg hopes that proceeds from this year's program will well exceed last year's $88,000. "One person has already brought in over $4,000 in pledges," he said.

The Toronto Heel 'n' Wheel-a-Thon is one of 55 such events to take place across Canada to raise funds for inflammatory bowel disease (IBD). Weisberg estimates that between 200,000 and 300,000 people across Canada suffer from IBD, the collective term for such diseases as Crohn's or colitis.

While pre-registration is not required, "we would love to hear from you ahead of time," Weisberg said. To pre-register, or for more information, call 920-1212.

A showcase of award winners

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Transformation, an exceptional exhibition of Canadian craftsmanship marking the 20th anniversary of the Prix Saidye Bronfman Award is no ordinary show.

Transformation celebrates the works of Prix Saidye Bronfman Award winners from the last decade, including fibre artist Carole Sabiston; glass artist Lutz Haufschild; potter Harlan House; textile artist Dorothy Caldwell; fibre artist Susan Warner Keene; potter Walter Dexter; furniture designer and maker Michael C. Fortune; glass artist Daniel Crichton; bookbinder Louise Genest and ceramic artist Steven Heineman. It also features recipients honored in the first 10 years.

The Award is bestowed on Canadian craftspeople who are not only masters in their field but have contributed to the arts in Canada through teaching, publishing, exhibiting and involvement in their professional communities. It carries with it a $20,000 cash prize administered by the Canadian Crafts Council. In addition, the Canadian Museum of Civilization acquires works by winners for its permanent collection.

In the '20s and '30s, says Matthew Teitelbaum, chief curator of the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO), the gallery was very much into crafts. But for many years after, there was a split between crafts and art. Now, in a return to the early trend, crafts are seen, Teitelbaum affirms, as "worthwhile and valuable conversation."

Alan Elder, curator of the exhibition, notes that "in many ways this is a homecoming."

Transformation has several meanings as familiar traditions find new expression and changes in attitude toward handmade objects are reflected. The substantial and thoughtful award also changes people's perception of crafts.

The 70 pieces displayed, encompass a variety of disciplines from pottery to stained glass to fibre art to bookbinding and each individual brings his/her view.

Potter Harlan House, whose exquisite porcelain with crackle glass vase can be seen, declares, "I am keenly interested in the element of time. It seems to me that much of what we have today is volatile like a firecracker, lovely to see, very impressive, loud — and gone. While that's fine as entertainment, our culture is more than that. I choose to make forms that will be as strong tomorrow as they are today."

Fibre artist Dorothy Caldwell says that the imagery of her work is inspired by tribal cultures, objects and symbols in which one can sense the power and mystery. One example is her intriguing work, The Snow is Almost Gone, an intricate batik hanging on handmade fabric.

Transformation is a display of finely honed skills and creativity with wide appeal plus a challenge and delight for craftspeople. Sponsored by Seagram, the exhibition runs at the Art Gallery of Ontario until Aug. 4 and will tour across Canada until September 1988.

Women artists late-bloomers

TORONTO — Four Toronto-area women who began painting with water-colors as a hobby less than four years ago have blossomed into serious artists.

They'll be holding their first exhibition from May 23 to 25 at the historic Frederick Horseman Gallery in Unionville at 197 Main St.

Rosalie Seidelman, Myra Barook and Brenda Bornstein, who have formed a painting group called Wembley Studios, met through a water-color class given by Elaine Clarfield-Gitalis four years ago.

• Markham Theatre's fall season opens Oct. 14 with Alfred Uhry's acclaimed play Driving Miss Daisy, a touching story about an elderly Jewish widow and her friendship with her chauffeur in the southern United States. Other plays in the series are Ain't Misbehavin', Dave Broadfoot's Old Enough to Say What I Want, and Supreme Dream. Subscription info, 905-305-7469.

• Stage Centre Productions's 21st season features these plays: Ten Little Indians, Ghosts, You Can't Take It With You, A Tale of Two Cities, A Little Night Music. Subscription info, 416-299-5557.

• Comedienne Tsufit performs at Oasis, 294 College St., Toronto, May 28, 8:30 p.m. Also at Yuk Yuks, June 1. 416-967-6425.

At the Galleries

• Dreams, Deliriums and Delusions: Willed Photographs, 1987-1997 presents a survey of photographic works by New York-based artist Bill Jones. Drawing upon the kabbalah and other medieval Jewish texts, Jones treats light as a visual metaphor for the presence of the sacred or supernatural, producing photographic images unaided by the camera. Koffler Gallery, Bathurst Jewish Centre, 4588 Bathurst St. The adjoining Loggia Gallery features works by Montreal artist Kevin Ei-ichi deForest. Admission free. To June 15. 416-636-1880, ext. 268.

• Two Sculptors, Inc. of New York presents Evolution /// Steel, a first solo exhibition of the work of designer Jeffrey Rubinoff, a 57-year-old native of London, Ont. who now lives on Hornby Island, B.C. 212-645-3584.

Exhibit a first for women artists

Susan Cohen joined the class and the group a year later.

The women said they all shared a mutual enthusiasm about watercolor and to maintain their inspiration between classes, they began painting with each other.

They've stopped taking classes, but they continue to get together weekly to paint and give each other encouragement and criticism, they said.

Seidelman and Barook are members of the Toronto Water Colour Society (TWCS), while Bornstein and Cohen are associate members, and they're all members of the Markham group of artists.

Seidelman and Barook currently have works in a TWCS exhibition at Earl Bales Park Community Centre that runs to the end of this month.

"All our work is accepted by juried shows. That's a real coup," Cohen said.

And when Seidelman won an honorable mention award at the TWCS show, the group members were all proud, Bornstein said.

Seidelman, a former Montrealer who runs Images Art Gallery for Inuit art with her husband, studied briefly at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts before becoming an X-ray technician. She continued to dabble in art while raising her daughters, now 17 and 22, she said.

Barook, the mother of two children in their 30s and a grandmother of two, grew up in Ottawa where she attended art college. She worked in different media before returning to water-color four years ago.

Bornstein, a part-time bookkeeper and a mother of three children, 21, 18 and 14, grew up in Toronto. She had taken many art courses — she even completed a five-year interior design course — before settling on water-color, she said. "I just fell in love with the medium."

Cohen, the mother of two children, 21 and 18, grew up among artists on a farm just outside of Montreal. She said she never studied art but saw that Seidelman, was having so much fun painting with water-colors that she too decided to enrol in the art class.

Cohen's work was accepted into a juried show at Markham and she was awarded a viewer's choice award though the TWCS. She has sold several paintings. Selling is a "real validation for me," she said. "Selling is like getting an award."

The women — they'll also be exhibiting at Edward's Gardens in July — said their families are very supportive. "All our husbands are extremely proud of our new careers," Bornstein said. "Our families are our best critics."

Fundraiser a cross-cultural mix

TORONTO — The Bloor JCC is hosting Black, White & Yiddish, a musical fundraiser set in a unique key. The evening is a cross-cultural celebration that combines the traditions of Broadway, opera, folk, spiritual and Yiddish music.

The performance stars Denise Williams, an accomplished soprano and alumnus of the Toronto Mendelssohn Choir and Tafelmusik, Susan Cuthbert, the lead female Christine in the original Toronto production of Phantom of the Opera, and Gloria Valentine, who amongst other things starred in The Harry Harris Jewish Musical Hour. Valentine conceived and created Black, White & Yiddish. Musical director is William Shookhoff, musical conductor for Phantom of the Opera.

Gloria Valentine

These three women, each from a different ethnic background, (hence the title) will perform songs ranging from high drama to hilarious comedy, from Gospel to Chassidic and everything in between.

All proceeds from the show will go to support the Bloor JCC. June 1, 7 p.m. 750 Spadina Ave. Tickets $15 or $20 at the door. For information call 924-6211.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

MARRAKESH JOURNAL

No matter where you go in Morocco, no matter what you do, you are never far from sites of importance to the country's rich Jewish past, which according to legend dates back more than 2,000 years to the days of the Second Temple.

In Marrakesh, the Petit-Taxi lets you off in Djemaa el Fnaa Square at dusk. Lined by nondescript old buildings and crowded with taxis, donkey-carts, locals, tourists and performers, the square's exotic midway atmosphere cannot fail to dazzle you.

Turn your head and acrobats form a human pyramid; jugglers exchange balls and brass rings; snake-charmers awaken curiously docile cobras with their mystical flutes; and African dancers gyrate to tribal rhythms. There are also Arabic storytellers, food vendors, musicians, occult herbalists, tattoo artists and (be warned) pickpockets.

Take a picture. Instantly you are besieged by outstretched palms, hats or tambourines: pay up or move on quickly. Guides attach themselves to you, determined to be hired. Fortune tellers and monkey-trainers solicit you. Five-year- old children tug at your sleeves for money.

Eventually, having soaked in as much local color as you need, you retreat to one of the rooftop cafes bordering the square, where for the price of a Coke (5 dirham or 85 cents) you may relax undisturbed and drink in the exhilirating view.

From below rises the hubbub of Djemaa el Fnaa, as it has for centuries. To the west the grand medieval Koutoubia Mosque towers against the sunset.

Eastward is the souk. Venturing by twilight into its maze of narrow alleys, you find leather goods, spices, jewellery, antiques, materials, Berber and Saharan carpets, and, surprisingly, a profusion of Judaic items: Magen Davids, menorahs, mezuzot, seder plates of silver and brass.

There are perhaps 400 Jews in Marrakesh, perhaps 6,000 in all Morocco, a French- and Arabic-speaking kingdom with some 28 million subjects. Most of the former 200,000-strong Jewish population made aliyah to Israel in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s; others migrated to France and Canada.

Thousands of Jews visit Morocco each year, frequenting good kosher restaurants like Le Sepharade, 31 Lottissement, Hassania, and Le Kasher in the Hotel Pullman (both supervised by the local Beth Din).

The next morning, seeking tranquility, you visit the Menara Pavilion, a huge manmade pond whose peaceful waters reflect the snow-capped peaks of the distant High Atlas Mountains. Next it's the Majorelle Gardens, a lush private plantation of coconut palms, banana trees and bougainvillea.

Outdoing both of these for sheer grandeur, however, is La Mamounia Hotel, the country's most deluxe address for tourists. Winston Churchill used to spend his winters here, painting.

After touring King Hassan II's Royal Palace with its myriad inlaid tiles and antiquated harem courtyard, you discover the Mellah, the former Jewish quarter, just beyond the palace gates. A guide takes you down the bustling narrow lane — rue de la Talmud Torah! — to the hidden Lazama Synagogue. Inside, the Jewish caretaker, old and blind, blesses you with the Torah scroll, then pleads for tzedakah. (The main synagogue, Beth El Kadosh, is situated across town in a neighborhood where some 40 Jewish families reside.)

An hour's drive into the verdant Ourika Valley south of Marrakesh brings you to Asni and other Berber villages in the High Atlases. According to legend, the Berbers are Canaanites descended from Goliath the Philistine. In centuries past several isolated groups of Berbers, influenced by Jewish traders, converted to Judaism.

Partway back to Marrakesh, an elderly Jewish couple shows you inside an old synagogue that has become a shrine to Rabbi Solomon Ben Lahnech, an 18th-century rabbi who went out from Jerusalem on a holy mission and died here. Another tiny synagogue in the Ourika Valley commemorates Rabbi Chaim Ben Diwan, a revered holy man.

Encountering more Jewish history in Agadir and Tarroudont, you realize that wherever you go in Morocco and whatever you do, you will probably continue to come upon important Jewish sites like these, quite by chance.

Guidebook recommendation: the Knopf Guide to Morocco.

Bill Gladstone flew Montreal to Marrakesh via Royal Air Maroc and traveled in Morocco as the guest of the Moroccan National Tourist Office.

Bank pressured to change pace of shekel's devalutation

Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM — The Bank of Israel has denied reports it intends to change the pace of the shekel's devaluation within the so-called diagonal mechanism.

The denial was issued following a report in the Hebrew daily Ha'aretz which alleged the central bank intends redrawing the axis around which all shekel trading revolves.

That axis, which describes the difference between Israel's inflation target and its major trading partners' expected inflation, is currently geared toward an annual six percent depreciation of the shekel in relation to the central bank's basket of major foreign currencies.

The Bank of Israel allows the shekel to appreciate or depreciate up to seven percent from the middle point of that axis, which graphically is a diagonal line running along a 12-month period. Since 1993, the central bank has set this middle line at 6 percent, but according to the report the bank intends reducing that figure to four percent.

The bank denies that but would not rule out a possible change to the diagonal mechanism at some point in the future.

The currencies used against the shekel in the mechanism are the U.S. dollar, Japanese yen, German mark, British pound and French franc.

There have been increasing calls from the Treasury and economists for the central bank to make changes to the mechanism, particularly since the dollar is continuing to gain strength against the shekel, causing the bank to purchase large sums of foreign currency.

Pitching the perfect script

By CINDY WAXER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — It's not often that a documentary elicits gales of laughter, features 15 celebrity appearances and includes a recipe for hummus. Then again, Pitch isn't exactly your average film.

Created by Kenny Hotz and Spencer Rice, Pitch is the result of the two Jewish filmmakers' struggle to sell a feature script they had written, entitled The Dawn, a mob comedy about a Mafia don who goes into the hospital for a hernia operation and winds up receiving a sex change.

Following numerous rejections from Hollywood's top producers and agents, Hotz and Rice decided to document their thwarted and often comedic efforts.

"The story is the titanic struggle of David against Goliath," says Rice.

Schlepping 700 pounds of camera equipment to the Toronto International Film Festival, they began filming their attempts to sell The Dawn. Their antics included making a pitch to director Norman Jewison at a press conference, seeking the advice of film critic Roger Ebert, cornering actor Eric Stoltz on his way into a premiere and miraculously placing a copy of The Dawn into the hands of Al Pacino.

"We have inadvertently ruined any other filmmakers from documenting the film festival. I dived on Al Pacino coming out of an elevator," Hotz says jokingly.

After shooting Pitch in Toronto, they took their camera crew and their aggressive sales campaign on the road. Arriving in Los Angeles, they met with such Hollywood figures as Neil Simon, Arthur Hiller and Samuel Z. Arkoff and these interviews are documented in the film.

Yet despite 15 celebrity appearances, the genuine stars of Pitch are its creators. Having worked together for seven years, Hotz and Rice have co-directed and produced the successful films It Don't Cost Nothin to Say Good Morning, Bloor Hawaii, and the award-winning short Something Anything. They are working on a script for a new Fox TV sitcom.

"Partnership is tough. And I think we both have big egos which makes it tougher. But at some point you realize that the sum is better than the individual parts so you stay together," says Rice.

Yet despite having a symbiotic relationship, these struggling filmmakers couldn't be more different. Hotz, a photographer whose documentation of the Gulf War appears in four Canadian museums, possesses a self-deprecating sense of humor, whereas Rice, a graduate of the York University film program, is an extremely intense individual.

But it is the vivid contrast between these personalities that allows Pitch to examine a sometimes ruthless industry from a human perspective. Beneath the film's exposure of renegade sales tactics and celebrity shmoozing, Hotz and Rice demonstrate the genuine frustration, rejection and humiliation their partnership must weather in order to succeed in the highly competitive field of film.

"Anyone who's in the industry, I don't care how big they are now, were rejected at some point. And when you realize that that's the battle, it separates the men from the boys," says Rice.

Currently taking a break from pitching scripts and accosting celebrities, Hotz and Rice are waiting for a distribution deal, in order to release Pitch in theatres nationwide, an experience that might make for another unusual documentary.

Neil Simon's Rewrites

Playwright chronicles success

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — If the word bittersweet has often been associated with phenomenal American playwright Neil Simon, one need only read his recent memoir Rewrites (Simon & Schuster, $34) to understand why.

In it, he shares a string of typically good-humored tales of his quick ascent up the ladder of theatrical success, from his days of writing for television in the late 1950s, through his first Broadway hit Come Blow Your Horn in 1960, to his enormously successful play The Odd Couple — the television spin-off of which has earned millions in royalties, not a penny of which he has ever seen.

Through his seemingly inexhaustible talent for fashioning likable, wise-cracking stage characters caught in the all-too-human vice of modern urban living, Simon has earned an exalted place in the top echelons of modern playwrights.

With 25 works to his credit, he has authored "more successful plays than anyone since Shakespeare," according to director Hal Prince. The list includes Barefoot In The Park, The Gingerbread Lady, Last Of The Red Hot Lovers, The Sunshine Boys, Brighton Beach Memoirs, Biloxi Blues and Lost In Yonkers, for which he won a Pulitzer prize in 1991.

Yet in the aptly-titled Rewrites, Simon acknowledges that almost none of it came easily. He describes recurrent bouts of laboring around the clock before opening night to fix some overwhelmingly intractable problem with a scene or — in the case of The Odd Couple — an entire act. "Some plays come easily," he writes, "some take time, and some feel as though you're pushing Noah's Ark, after the flood, up Mount Ararat, animals included."

Those who earn their living by writing may be reassured to learn that even a seasoned pro like Simon has sometimes faced writer's block, or at least the seeming inability to write himself out of a difficult situation.

As Walter Matthau, Art Carney and other members of the original Odd Couple cast rehearsed for its Boston try-out under the direction of Mike Nichols, it became apparent to all concerned that the third and final act wasn't working. Simon rewrote it in four days; the result was better, but not much.

Endless revisions later, the play opened: "As the curtain came down on a somewhat wobbly third act, we got a rousing reaction from that gracious and forgiving first preview audience."

Simon, who generally doesn't have much use for reviewers, credits Boston critic Elliot Norton for giving the simple advice that saved the play: "Why don't you bring back those Pigeon Sisters, who were so darned funny in the second act?"

Ultimately, The Odd Couple became the hottest ticket on Broadway, prompting Simon to ponder his extraordinary good fortune: "I had the most wonderful wife a man could want, two incredible children, the perfect dog, my health, and a sonic boom of a hit that would eventually reverberate around the world."

Simon's memoir ends with his sad description of his wife Joan's cancer and her death in the summer of 1973, an event as monumentally significant to his oeuvre as it has been to his life.

Just as he subsequently wrote Chapter Two, a play about the touchingly human perils of widowhood and remarriage, one expects that he will eventually produce a second instalment of his memoirs, filled with more revealing, funny —and occasionally bittersweet — tales of a life lived at the heart of New York's theatrical demimonde.

Corey Mincovitch wears his Jewish pride close to his heart. He sports tattoos of a magen David and a chai on his chest and of Moses and Samson, "the two strongest Jews," on his arms.

Taekwon-Do black belt seeks Maccabiah medal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's a good thing Corey Mincovitch realized he needed some discipline when he enrolled in Kung Fu and Taekwon-Do classes back when he was 16. In his early years, he was admittedly a wild kid who didn't take direction from anyone.

At 5-foot-11, 240 pounds, it's best for all concerned that Mincovitch tamed those rowdy spirits and directed them where they can do some good. In July he'll do just that when he tangles with other Taekwon-Do fighters at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

The competition's only heavyweight who lives up to the designation, Mincovitch is confident he'll bring home a medal, probably a gold. Most of the other scrappers are much smaller and because of the dearth of big men for him to compete against, Mincovitch will tangle with 184-pounders who'll also be considered heavyweights.

"The lighter guys will buzz around me for a while but when I get one kick in, they'll go down. I'm not concerned," he said matter-of-factly, as if discussing his lunch menu.

After checking the computerized database of the National Federation of Taekwon-Do and doing a rather unscientific guessing game of matching fighters to Jewish-sounding names, Mincovitch believes he's the second highest rated Jewish master in North America. Number 1 is a seventh dan black belt in California, but he's a lightweight.

Certified Microsoft systems engineer

Mincovitch is a fifth degree black belt who boasts 22-inch arms, a 55-inch chest and who can bench press 475 pounds. A certified Microsoft systems engineer, proving there's brains to go along with the brawn, Mincovitch holds the super-heavyweight Commonwealth Taekwon-Do title. To keep up his level of fitness and to be ready for Israel's steamy summertime heat, he's in the gym five days a week lifting weights. He follows that up with an hour-long Taekwon-Do workout.

Canada's national heavyweight champion, Mincovitch, 34, usually fights in recreational competitions, finishing first earlier this year in the John Park Tournament in Toronto. Since there were no Jewish opponents for him to compete against prior to qualifying for the team, Mincovitch had to show his wares at a Toronto-area Do-Jong (Taekwon-Do venue), fighting non-Jews.

A master "sensi," Mincovitch teaches the discipline at Harrison's Taekwon-Do in Richmond Hill and he's travelled to Korea to train with masters in the sport's home country.

Taekwon-Do is a martial art that stresses kicking in an offensive capacity, Mincovitch said. It takes its tolls on practitioners, even in friendly competitions. Fighters, who wear headgear and athletic supporters for protection, make full contact and knockouts are common with kicks to the head. In his storied career, Mincovitch has broken his leg, his jaw and lost some teeth.

Still, Mincovitch credits the discipline and hard work necessary for excellence in the sport with keeping him on the right side of the tracks. Instead of getting into trouble, he was in the gym from 5 to 8 p.m. working out and lifting weights.

It also proved an effective deterrent to the anti-Semitic bullies who picked on him as a youth. Once he learned how to defend himself and developed some size, they kept away, he says.

For Mincovitch, the Maccabiah promises to be a once-in-a-lifetime experience that links him to previous generations of his family and gives him a venue for his Jewish pride Two of his uncles represented Canada at the games. Sidney Charendoff brought home three of four gold medals in weightlifting from Games in the late 1950s and early '60s. Another uncle, Abe Cooper, played on the Canadian basketball team in the '60s.

A proud Jew who wears his allegiances close to his heart — he sports tattoos of a magen David and a chai on his chest, of Samson and Moses on his arms — Mincovitch said "I'm on pins and needles" in anticipation of the upcoming Israel experience.

Canada's Taekwon-Do team at the Maccabiah Games will be managed by Adam Koffler of Ontario. In addition to Mincovitch, the men's team includes Robert Bradley of Ontario, Raz Keshles and Robert Kurlender of Quebec. The one-athlete women's team consists of Michael Meroz of Manitoba.

Films used as tool to fight prejudice

By CINDY WAXER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — All people have the power within themselves to fight prejudice, some 150 participants in the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival's student program learned.

Presented in association with the Edward Bronfman Family Foundation and the National Coalition Building Institute (NCBI), the program at the Bloor Cinema featured three short films.

In the award-winning video Untitled, filmmaker Seth Kramer chronicles the counting and bottling of six million grains of rice, to illustrate the tragedy of the Holocaust and the significance of a statistic. Kramer was at the program to answer questions from the students.

The Israeli film Second Watch, which elicited the most student response, tells the story of Berkowitz, a soldier who, while guarding a desolate stretch of the Israeli-Jordanian border, befriends a Jordanian soldier through the exchange of a Playboy magazine and a canteen of water.

And the program's third film, Janet Perlman's animated short Dinner for Two, which featured two lizards fighting to devour the same insect, illustrates the nature of conflict and non-violent ways to resolve contentious issues.

"I think kids are very visual now ...They grew up with television and I think film has a great impact on them," says Helen Zukerman, president of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Following the screenings, Felice Markowicz, associate director of the Toronto chapter of the NCBI, and Leola Sullivan, a high school teacher who is also a member of the NCBI, conducted a workshop that centred on conflict resolution skills.

"We're talking to students about what it means to overcome powerlessness,what are some of those things that you need to discover within yourself, something called your centre of power," says Sullivan.

Students were asked to form pairs and to gently push one another to recreate the feelings of intimidation and powerlessness that come from encountering discrimination.

Then, using visualization techniques, Sullivan and Markowicz taught students how to tap into the inner strength they possess that can be used to non-violently diffuse an incendiary situation.

Finally, students were instructed to gently push one another again, this time experiencing greater control of the situation through a reclaimed sense of their personal strength.

"I thought it was a non-aggressive, sort of defensive stance involving power," says Jeananne Goossen, a high school student from Jarvis Collegiate Institute.

Rather than simply prescribe group activities to combat racism, the workshop taught students a way to take charge of a conflict on a one-to-one basis.

"I think it's more about self-empowerment than it is about collectively doing something [to fight discrimination]. As an individual, you are powerful enough to do something," says Markowicz.

"A lot of young people know that we need to do something. It's just about giving them the tools to empower themselves," says Sullivan.

CRANBERRY-PEACH OATMEAL KUGEL

1 can whole cranberry sauce
1 16 oz can sliced peaches, drained
1/2 cup vegetable oil
2 cups uncooked oatmeal
3/4 cups flour
1 tsp cinnamon
1/4 cup brown sugar

Mix dry ingredients with oil. Grease 8-inch square pan. Spread half of dry ingredients mixture in pan. In separate bowl, mix drained peaches with cranberry sauce. Pour that mixture into the pan. Add remaining dry mixture. Bake uncovered at 350°F for 1 hour. Serve hot. Serves 6-8 people.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

I am so distraught! No matter what I do or say, my mother is angry and unreasonable. She suffers from short-term memory loss, has emphysema and needs oxygen. She was admitted to hospital where she fell out of bed and broke her hip. They have restrained her.

I can't cope. When I visit her, she cries and begs me to take her home. I just can't.

BN

Dear BN,

This is a very difficult situation. You need support and help. Speak to the medical staff at the hospital to know what the long-range treatment plan is for your mother. If you have not met the social worker, ask to see her. She might recommend a "caregiver" support group or individual counselling to help you understand your mother's illness and the limits of your responsibility.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal

DELINQUENT SPRAYER

Israeli police arrested a young boy last week on suspicion of having sprayed tear gas into the eyes of two Palestinian boys. The incident is alleged to have happened as Jews protested roadwork by Palestinians on Hebron's main street which runs alongside the Jewish enclave in the heart of the city. [RNS/Reuters]

MK 'uprising' threatened

Right-wingers reject compromise on Har Choma

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's denials that he would compromise on Har Choma were largely disbelieved by a group of right-wing MKs, who issued warnings on Monday that moves to appease the Palestinians, Egyptians and Americans will mean the end of his government.

Some MKs in the group called the Land of Israel Front said they had concrete information that a decision had already been taken in the Prime Minister's Office and there would be no outright halt to construction to save Netanyahu's face and attempt to stave off an uprising within the coalition.

However, they said, there would be a work stoppage, which would be attributed to technical difficulties, or a de facto equal division of the housing between Jews and Arabs.

These theories circulating among Front members were hotly denied by those close to Netanyahu, who said construction for Arabs will not be begun at sites on Har Choma itself.

This did little to calm the anxieties of those on the right. The suspicion is he has made pledges to the Egyptians and the Americans as a payment for agreement to hold the Sharm el-Sheikh summit.

Officially, however, the front sought to put a positive spin on things and issued a statement urging Netanyahu "not to give in to pressure."

The statement spoke of the front members "strengthening Netanyahu's steadfast resolve."

Nevertheless, unequivocal warnings were sounded: Any backtracking from the present position on Har Choma, even if coated with a variety of pretexts, will lead the group to leave the coalition and bring the government down.

The front, headed by Gesher MK Michael Kleiner, is said to include some 20 MKs from all coalition factions, and its members believe it is likely to attract the support of others who are not formally associated with it, including that of several Likud ministers.

"It will simply not be possible for us to betray our consciences and continue to support a government if it betrays the most basic and sacred promise it made to the voters

Liberals heading for victory

By DAVID TARAS
Special to The CJN

When Canadians go to the polls on June 2, they will elect a second Liberal government led by Jean Chrétien. The Liberals' victory will be based largely on rock-solid support in Ontario, but also on an ability to draw significant support in every region of the country. In electing the Liberals, voters will overlook a chain of broken promises ("jobs, jobs, jobs") and a prime minister whose performance on national unity has been less than inspiring.

Still, the Liberals with their cautious search for the middle ground, for the political centre, for policies that will offend the fewest voters seem to be the most in tune with the electorate. In his own folksy way, Chrétien radiates an old-fashioned sense of balance and public service — and it's stability that most Canadians seem to desire.

But what keeps the Liberals afloat are the other options.

Election '97
Analysis

Most Canadians are not yet willing to hitch a ride on the Reform bandwagon. With roots in Social Credit, in the politics of Prairie protest and in Bible-belt evangelical Protestantism, Reform has had difficulty reaching voters outside of its western base. Preston Manning's now well-known blue denim shirt doesn't seem to wear as well once he leaves the West.

More important perhaps is that the wave of voter anger, whose crest Reform rode during the 1993 election, now seems to have petered out. Most voters seem indifferent, more turned off than angry. And the issues that propelled Reform during the 1993 election — fighting the deficit, controlling government spending and getting tough on crime — have been taken away by the Liberals. It's hard to find room to the political right of Paul Martin Jr. without appearing to be too extreme, too close to the edge of the political spectrum.

In fact, Manning has been left with only one card to play — the rejection of "distinct society"

Secular Jews Meet

WINDSOR — The North American Federation of Secular Humanistic Jews held its annual conference and convention last week at the University of Windsor.

New Generations

TORONTO — The New Israel Fund of Canada is relaunching its New Generations program for young Jewish people in their 20s and 30s.

The group will sponsor local education and outreach programs in addition to offering opportunities to participate in the fund's work in Israel. For details, call Talya Rotem-Assaf at 416-781-4322.

Closing Luncheon

KINGSTON — The Queen Esther chapter of Kingston Hadassah-WIZO is presenting a luncheon on June 1 to close its annual Youth Aliyah/Youth Services campaign. Guest speaker will be Hadassah national president Patricia Alpert.

All donations to the campaign will be designated to perpetuate the memory of Ethel Abramsky by dedicating the music department at the Ben Yakir Youth Village near Hadera in Israel. For information, call 613-389-6515.

ISRAEL

Guess Who?

JERUSALEM — The Israeli known for his ability to bend spoons using his mind believes he has what it takes to make peace between Israel and Syria.

To that end, psychic Uri Geller has said he is considering running for the Knesset in the next general elections in the year 2000.

Aqaba Landings

JERUSALEM — Israeli planes will soon be allowed to land at the Jordanian port city of Aqaba.

Jordan and Israel have been discussing the possibility of expanding the existing Aqaba airport to also serve the nearby southern Israeli resort town of Eilat.

JERUSALEM — A large book fair and heritage exhibition are two of the events taking place during Arab Culture Month, which kicked off on Sunday.

The book fair, which is featuring books from Israel and Arab countries, will run through June 6. The heritage exhibition, displaying thousands of items of clothing, pottery and housewares, will close on May 31.

WORLD

Deportation Ordered

NEW YORK — A U.S. immigration judge has ordered the deportation of a Pennsylvania man who served as an armed Nazi SS guard during World War II.

Nikolaus Schiffer, 78, worked at several concentration camps as a member of the SS Death's Head Battalions. He will be deported to Romania.

U.N. Ambassador

WASHINGTON — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, appointed his top political adviser, Dore Gold, to become Israel's ambassador to the United Nations last week.

U.S. Aid To Israel

WASHINGTON — The era of federal fiscal responsibility has collided with the Middle East peace process to result in a likely cut in U.S. foreign aid to both Israel and Egypt.

Under an emerging U.S. plan, $50 million from each country would be redirected to a newly created Middle East fund for "peace and stability."

Jordan would be the primary beneficiary of the fund, as a sign of appreciation for its warmer peace with Israel, according to U.S. and Israeli sources.

The cut in Israel's $3 billion in aid could be offset by additional military spending for the Jewish state.

Holocaust Memorial

BUENOS AIRES — Uruguayan security officials are investigating an arson attack against a Holocaust memorial in the capital of Montevideo.

A letter left at the site by a group calling itself the Eastern Special Command said, "All Jews must leave Uruguay at once or they will be exterminated."

HIJACKER WANTS TO CONVERT TO JUDAISM

Therese "Tirza" Halaseh, the female terrorist wounded in the Israeli recapture of the hijacked Sabena airliner, says she wants to convert to Judaism.

"Now that I have been given Jewish blood [through transfusion], I want to become Jewish. I have always liked Jews...Even in the Fatha they said I was partial to the Jews," she told the Central Command officer Aluf Rehavam Ze'vi, who visited her and the wounded passengers at the Sheba Hospital.

The 18-year-old woman, who literally held the lives of 100 people in her hands for nearly 24 hours, talked freely in Hebrew. The rabbinate indicated the conversion would be difficult, if not impossible.

ONE IN 12 TAY-SACHS CARRIERS, STUDY SHOWS

One out of every 12 Jews in Metro Toronto is a carrier of Tay-Sachs disease, according to tests conducted on 2,500 people by Dr. Alex Losden, a Toronto researcher.

"We've found a greater proportion of Tay-Sachs carriers in the Toronto area than anywhere else in North America," Dr. Losden said of the disease which almost totally cripples children before killing them about five years after birth.

Court names 11th alleged war criminal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An alleged former concentration camp guard in Latvia is the 11th man facing deportation from Canada for involvement in war crimes.

Documents filed in Federal Court last week claim that Eduards Podins, 78, lied to immigration and citizenship officials when he failed to disclose his wartime collaboration with German forces.

The documents allege Podins served as a member of the Latvian Auxiliary Police from 1941-43 and as a concentration camp guard at the Valmiera Replacement Prison.

Podins, a resident of Burnaby, B.C., a suburb of Vancouver, is contesting the allegations, according to Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit.

Further documentation detailing the government case against Podins will be filed next week, Vickery added.

Podins is the 11th of 12 alleged Nazi war criminals to have received citizenship-revocation or deportation notices. Two of the 12, Antanas Kenstavicius and Josef Nemsila, died in the early stages of their cases. The 12th man has yet to be named.

Anger, outrage mark anti-Nazi rally

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Anger and outrage marked a community rally last week to press for continued action against Nazi war criminals living in Canada.

The Jewish community owes it to the victims of the Holocaust not to let the issue rest and not to allow their killers to live tranquil lives, said Nazi-hunter Efraim Zuroff.

The Jewish community must push the Canadian government, which historically has lacked the political will to act against war criminals, into bringing these perpetrators to justice, he said.

Speaking to about 300 people at the North York City Hall Chambers, Zuroff said the Canadian government has known about war criminals who immigrated to Canada since war's end but has done done almost nothing about it.

In 1949, Canadian Jewish Congress presented the RCMP with affidavit evidence implicating Antanas Kenstavicius in the murder of civilians in Lithuania. As a member of the 12th Lithuanian Police Battalion, which killed more than 50,000 Jews, Kenstavicius participated in the murder of Jews in the Byelorussian city of Slutsk. The unit went on a killing rampage that shocked even the local German commander, who requested that the unit not be sent to his area again.

Despite receiving 10 affidavits attesting to Kenstavicius's role in the killings, law enforcement officials did nothing about the case for decades, Zuroff said. (Kenstavicius died recently in British Columbia on the first day of his deportation hearing.)

Zuroff, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's Jerusalem office, said the Allies knew of Nazi atrocities early in the war. In the Moscow Declaration of November 1943, they pledged to bring war criminals to justice. Yet only a few years later, Western nations opened their doors to the perpetrators of murder.

Discounting the notion that it was because they were only "small cogs" or "small fish," Zuroff pointed out it was these men who actually pulled the trigger in the murder of Jews. In Latvia, members of the Arajs Kommando lined up Jews in front of open trenches and shot them. Later, Communists and Gypsies were killed in the same manner. Afterwards, the killers were given rations of vodka and snacks.

"It was these people who carried out the Holocaust. Without their zealous participation none of this would have happened," he said.

Tracing the history of Canada's meagre efforts to bring war criminals to justice, Zuroff said Judge Jules Deschenes, who in 1986 investigated war criminals living in Canada, declined to seek information in Eastern Europe even though that is where the vast majority of war criminals came from.

Efraim Zuroff

He noted that Peter Kremer, former head of Canada's war crimes unit, wrote that a decision was made to pursue cases for which documentary evidence was available in the west.

"Without the proper information...is it any wonder that so many cases were closed?" Zuroff asked.

Earlier, North York Mayor Mel Lastman delivered an emotional address, calling Canada's treatment of Nazi war criminals "a record of shame...They have been letting Nazi war criminals get away with murder."

Whether it was "reluctance, incompetence or cowardice, up to now Ottawa has done nothing," he said.

The rally was sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

York's still a leader in scholarly work

The teachers' strike at York University, thankfully, has been resolved. It occupied a great deal of attention in the Greater Toronto Area and rightfully so, given the number of students whose lives were affected.

As in most union/management disputes that drag on, with the press regularly shining spotlights onto the disputants, the substance of the disagreement is often submerged in emotion.

This dispute was no different.

Forgotten by some members of the public, as a result of the disputants' frequent expressions of mutual distrust and rancor, is the fact that York University is an excellent university.

As an example, we point to some of the outstanding scholarship and teaching that takes place at the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University.

The past year has seen the publication of four significant but completely different scholarly works by members of the program's faculty:

• The Israeli-American Connection: Its Roots in the Yishuv, 1914-1945, by Michael Brown, the director of the centre, Wayne State University Press.

• Rashbam's Commentary on Exodus, An Annotated Translation, edited and translated by Martin Lockshin, Scholars Press.

• Multiculturalism, Jews and Identities in Canada, edited by Howard Adelman and John H. Simpson, Magnus Press.

• The Philistines in Transition, A History from ca. 1000-730 BCE, by Carl S. Ehrlich, E.J. Brill Publishers.

The range in the subject matter of these texts is quite impressive. I shall comment briefly only on Brown's opus.

The Israeli-American Connection: Its Roots in the Yishuv, 1914-1945 is an interesting and imaginative work.

Brown demonstrates that the current multifaceted relationship between Israel and the United States is not simply the sedimented residue from the geopolitical backwash of the Cold War. Rather, he points out persuasively that there are deep structural reasons for the relationship based on shared political philosophy and cultural affinity.

He traces the development of this special relationship through the "American experiences of six of the foremost leaders of Jewish Palestine...during the years that the framework for statehood and to a large degree, for the new Hebrew-speaking society was erected."

The leaders on whom he focuses are Vladimir Jabotinsky, Chaim Nahman Bialik, Berl Katznelson, Henrietta Szold, Golda Meir and David Ben-Gurion.

"Although it has not been much noticed by observers and analysts." Brown writes, "it was [the] contacts between the leaders of the yishuv and Americans in the prewar decades which laid the groundwork for the America-Israel alliance of more recent times."

Each of these six individuals contributed profoundly to the establishment of the state of Israel. They truly can be called "giants" of Israel's early history. Yet it is very likely that only Meir and Ben-Gurion are familiar to the young North American reader.

In brief, meticulously researched chapters, Brown chronicles the amazing and even, gripping lives. He uniquely captures the "role" of America in their lives and their respective roles in the life of Israel.

Brown summarizes his thesis at the text's very conclusion: "Whatever, their intentions, then, there can be no doubt that these six leaders and their compatriots oriented the yishuv, and eventually the state into which it developed, in the direction of America. As a group...they advanced significantly the development of links in the fields of finance, labor, politics, literature, journalism, public health, education, social welfare, and business, in fact in most important fields of human endeavor except religion, which remained largely impervious to American influences. After 1948, those intricate, manifold connections served as the Israeli foundation of the America-Israel alliance, which developed and deepened under the tutelage of Ben-Gurion...and of Golda Meir..."

In an age when Jewishness, Judaism and "connection" to Israel appear to becoming less and less relevant to the evolving generations of North American Jewry, Brown's book is potentially a very important teaching instrument.

But that is hardly unexpected from a person who has dedicated his life to teaching, and now, to teaching teachers.

The Israeli-American Connection: Its Roots in the Yishuv, 1914-1945 is a very worthwhile read.

Election Airings

At least to Jacques Parizeau, the irony must have been ever so delicious.

In mid-campaign during the referendum two years ago, he was forced by desperate colleagues to call in Lucien Bouchard to rescue the separatist cause from the certain defeat to which it appeared headed.

Bouchard's intervention was pivotal. The charismatic leader raised the emotional level of the campaign and blew fresh, reviving wind into the limp, Parizeau-held separatist sails.

Last week, it was Parizeau being summoned by Gilles Duceppe's desperate colleagues to rescue the Bloc's campaign from the certain demise to which it appears headed.

The irony must have seemed even richer to the former premier in light of the fact that only two weeks earlier Duceppe was publicly critical of Parizeau's referendum campaign tactics and of his views concerning the propriety of unilaterally declaring Quebec independent.

The fact that the Bloc leader should seek help in rallying the separatist vote from someone whose integrity he has publicly questioned is a cutting reminder to federalists of the " moral haziness" surrounding the good faith of the people who offer themselves as Canadians' future partners.

Holocaust stamps to be shredded

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada Post Corp. will destroy millions of its much-praised but unsold Holocaust stamps.

The stamps will be shredded in a "high-security" operation, says spokesperson Tim McGurrin.

McGurrin wouldn't say how many stamps will be destroyed, or when. The 45-cent issue was introduced in November, 1995 on the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II and the 57th anniversary of Kristallnacht.

Canada Post printed 15 million Holocaust stamps. On their last day of sale to the public — May 8, 1996 — two-thirds of them, or about 10 million, remained unsold.

Canada Post then teamed up with its Israeli counterpart to issue a "showcard" — a limited cover issue of two Holocaust stamps from both countries — for collectors at a philatelic exhibit in Toronto last May.

Canada's Holocaust stamp: millions will be destroyed.

No sales figures of the showcards are available. But according to Al Dickstein, past president of the Canadian Association for Israeli Philatelists, showcards are sold only to a limited number of collectors.

Millions of the stamps are currently warehoused and are no longer for sale, either to collectors or the public. McGurrin said they have not been earmarked for destruction yet, "but it will happen."

He explained that destruction of unsold stamps is routine.

More important, he said, is the awareness of the Holocaust the stamps created. "They went a long way toward that, and we were very pleased with the issue," McGurrin said.

Searching for Bayefsky's mural

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Call it the case of the missing mural.

Or, how does a 15 x 11 foot painting disappear?

It's a question renowned Judaic artist Aba Bayefsky has been asking for years, ever since one of his large-scale works mysteriously vanished.

Entitled Out of Bondage, the outsized mural was commissioned in the early 1960s by architect Martin Mendelow in memory of his father, Hyman. For several years, it hung in the lobby of the now-defunct Beth-El Synagogue on Don Mills Road. In 1970, Beth-El merged with Temple Emanu-El on Old Colony Road, and that's where the trail begins.

Mendelow says temple officials never found an appropriate spot for the mural, and it stayed wrapped and crated in the basement. When he became president of the northern branch of the Jewish Community Centre in the mid-1980s, he arranged for the piece to be transferred to the then newly-opened Lipa Green Building, and that's where the trail ends — and the plot thickens.

Mendelow believes the mural was stored somewhere in the building. But according to Gerry Fisher, who was in charge of the building's management in and around 1984, the painting was rejected by an official of a community agency.

Fisher, now director of human resources development for UJA/Federation of Greater Toronto, says the mural was then taken back to Temple Emanu-El.

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, who's been spiritual leader of the temple since 1968, says he's "absolutely certain" the painting was never returned to his synagogue.

And Randy Feldman, the temple's administrative coordinator, says the painting is not stored in the building.

Mendelow says he's considered reclaiming ownership of the mural for display in a building he's designed. But first he has to find it.

Bayefsky says the work was in acrylic colors and had Talmudic text in it, but "more than that I don't remember."

Mendelow says the painting's disappearance has caused him a lot of heartache over the years.

"It's an astounding piece of art," he told The CJN. "This is a sad story of neglect."

Key issues hindering peace process: Katsav

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel is facing a critical time in its history as it continues to pursue peace in the face of Palestinian demands that could put the Jewish state in danger, a tribute dinner in honor of Sara Pachter was told last week.

While Israel and the Palestinians have no alternative but to continue the peace process, vast distances separate the parties on three key issues, said Moshe Katsav, Israel's deputy prime minister.

Palestinian demands for a "right of return" to areas of pre-1967 Israel, their insistence on a division of Jerusalem and their call for self-determination are points of disagreement between the two, Katsav said.

Speaking at a State of Israel Bonds Women's Division dinner held at the Holy Blossom Temple, Katsav said there is wide consensus in Israel against dividing the holy city. "Jerusalem should remain the undivided capital of the Jewish people forever," he said.

Addressing the Palestinian demand to return to cities inside the "green line," within the borders of Israel before the Six Day War, Katsav said that would put Israel in danger of destruction. "We must prevent that or else it could be a national disaster."

Likewise, granting the Palestinians self-determination would be a danger to both Israel and the Hashimite Kingdom of Jordan. Jordan is already 70 to 80 percent Palestinian and if Yasser Arafat becomes president of a West Bank entity, he could provide East Bank Palestinians the political and military support needed to create a Palestinian state on both banks of the Jordan River, he warned.

Referring to Iran, the land of his birth, Katsav said Israel once had good relations with Iran but that changed overnight when the Shah was overthrown. That's why Israel needs guarantees to guard against developments that could endanger the Jewish state.

If Israel's Arab neighbors believe it is weak and vulnerable, they might attempt to destroy it, he added.

Ending on an upbeat note, Katsav, who has held the Labor and Transport portfolios in a 20-year career as a member of the Knesset, reminded the audience that Israel will begin celebrating its 50th anniversary beginning at Chanukah (December 1997). He urged Canadian Jews to visit Israel, pointing out that while two million Canadians travel abroad each year, only 60,000 visit Israel. And of that number, only 30 percent are Jews.

As the evening's festivities wound on, speaker after speaker praised Pachter for her role in bringing visitors to Israel. Over the past 36 years, working for the Fisher Fremont Travel Agency, she has led 132 tours to Israel. Friends, colleagues and family paid tribute to her indomitable energy, her zest for life and her commitment to the Jewish state.

Her son, artist Charles Pachter, pointed out that "this woman called Intrepid" led her first tour to Israel in 1959. "Not for her the role of a sit at home Jewish June Cleaver."

Sara, he said, is "loyal to the land...Put simply, she loves the place."

Her longtime friend, Ida Fienberg, called Sara the "queen" of Israel travel agents. "She has the zest and energy of a teenager...She's gracious, relaxed and a natural hostess."

Renee Bernbaum, co-chair of the tribute dinner, said Sara had helped create a bond between the Jewish people and the Land of Israel. She showed her personal solidarity with the Jewish state by visiting it during the Yom Kippur War and then during the Gulf War.

She has been involved with Israel Bonds since its inception in Toronto. The first Israel Bond was sold in her home, she added.

Pachter responded to the accolades with her well-noted good humor, pointing out that by no means did she intend to end her career. She's already planning for 1999, she said.

She first visited Israel in 1959 when her husband of 60 years, Harry (it only feels like 61, she told him), led a B'nai Brith delegation to a convention in Israel. It was so poorly organized she believed "I could do better with my arms tied behind my back."

In six weeks, she sold out a BOAC charter, with travellers paying $895 for a three-week trip to Israel.

"After that, it was a cinch."

She joined Fisher Fremont in 1962. Prior to that, she worked as a volunteer, relying on her widespread contacts in the Jewish community.

Pachter, whose community activities included volunteer work with Bonds, United Jewish Appeal, UNICEF, the Canadian Council of Christian and Jews and the Holy Blossom Sisterhood, concluded by reminding the guests that "we need Israel much more than Israel needs us."

Cultural, religious differences noted surrounding death

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Barry Schneider

TORONTO — It is essential for caregivers in the social services to understand the cultural and religious differences found in today's diverse communities.

These differences were addressed at the King's College's 15th International Conference on Death and Bereavement, which took place recently at the University of Western Ontario.

More than 450 caregivers and 49 speakers from Europe, Asia, Africa, South America and North America attended the three-day meeting whose theme was delivering care in a multicultural setting.

"Since individuals make decisions not only on the basis of facts immediately before them, but more fundamentally on the basis of their value systems, it is impossible to communicate effectively with, or deliver care to others, without knowing and appreciating their culture and traditions," said Dr. John Morgan, conference chair and coordinator of King's College Centre for Education About Death and Bereavement.

The program included sessions on the Hindu, Buddhist, Christian, Muslim and other religions, as well as on the Japanese, Indian and Portuguese cultures, and gender, gay and lesbian, and AIDS issues.

Several sessions were devoted to the specific needs of Jews.

Rabbi Barry Schneider of Beth Emeth-Bais Yehuda Synagogue, who has served as staff chaplain at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre for 16 years, said his goal is "normalization: to normalize the activities of patients and veterans who were active in the community before being hospitalized."

The hospital, he said, helps improve the spiritual and physical well-being of patients, caregivers, family members, staff and the community. He stressed the importance of bringing the community into hospital programs.

With a new synagogue at Sunnybrook, volunteer groups, family members and hospital staff participate in Sabbath and holiday services.

"The patients don't feel isolated when children and adults participate in their services."

He noted that more than 150 people — spouses, other family members, volunteers and children of volunteers — participated in the hospital's Passover seder.

He noted that there are 37 Jewish veterans living at Sunnybrook and one 98-year-old is a veteran of World War I.

Sunnybrook's synagogue has become a place of worship, study and social gathering for the Jewish community, he said. "We invite the community, encourage caregivers, their children and grandchildren into the synagogue. Those hospitalized enjoy seeing the community and they feel that they are part of it."

Other presenters who addressed Jewish issues included Rabbi Daniel Roberts, spiritual leader of Temple Emanu El in Cleveland, who examined the motivations that give meaning to life for the Jew, including life after death and the struggle to live.

Diane Korman, a hospice nurse practising in Moreland Hills, Ohio, spoke on Approaches to Caring for Jewish Hospice Patients.

Located in London, Ont., King's College has offered credit and non-credit courses, as well as one- and three-day symposia dealing with death, dying and bereavement in North America. The purpose of the centre is to provide education for King's College and the wider community, to foster scholarly activities and to develop links with international educational and health support groups.

More than a slogan

Democracy is more than a rallying cry at a town hall debate, more than a slogan at an all-candidates meeting and more than a lyric in an inspirational hymnal.

It is the defining context of our life together as human beings in one society, much like air is to breathing, or water is to swimming. It is, simply, the most precious aspect of our Canadian way of life.

A philosopher once wrote that democracy must be moral before it is political. By that he meant it must at all times be underpinned by the immutability of its central core value: the inherent dignity, worth and importance of every individual human being. The highest manifestations of democracy are in its unwavering loyalty to the principles of one person one vote, and to the rule of law.

It is true to say that the essence of democracy is process not outcome and the chief obligation therefore, is that we vote, not how we vote. The cynic will decline to vote and justify his decision on democracy's failures, blind to the fact that his attitude is its greatest failure. Democracy abhors that kind of cynicism, the kind that ridicules, immobilizes and ultimately alienates. Democracy requires commitment to its core value and responsibility to ensure the inviolability of its process.

However, we do not make light of or deny the importance of outcome as well.

Indeed, in next week's federal election, the outcome will have far-reaching implications for all Canadians. Despite the fact that many pollsters and pundits have cited job creation and the economy as Canadians' preferred election issues, we believe the single most compelling issue in this election is national unity.

The government we elect on June 2 will be the one which will deal with the result of the next referendum in Quebec. The House of Commons will be the one in which the very existence of Canada as a country will be debated and ultimately decided. This is not simply editorial hyperbole.

The separatists in Quebec know where they want to go and how to get there. The federalists in Canada on the other hand know only "where" they want to travel but not "how" to get there.

This election then, is more about "how" than it is about "where."

The 1997 federal election campaign has given us an unsmudged picture of the differences in how each of the major parties "travels" generally through the political landscape, but not specifically how they would arrive at a strong, federally united country.

Therefore, when we vote next week, we must ask ourselves the following questions: How can we best achieve a united country? Who are the true federalists? Who looks for and finds commonalities rather than differences? Who seeks to build rather than to destroy? Who are the most reliable?

We are at a crossroads in Canadian history. Of that there is no doubt. We must act by all lawful, democratic means to resist those who would break up our country. Canada is too precious to dismiss as a vision and a dream that ended, undefended, on the eve of the second millennium.

Democracy is indeed more than a slogan. And the people who are most faithful to it will abjure the ways of the cynic who avoids casting a ballot or who ridicules those who do. The people who are truly most faithful to democracy will vote on June 2 and will urge their friends and family to do so as well.

Objects to Conservative use of Halachah sanction

In Frances Kraft's May 15 article regarding sexism in the Conservative movement, Rabbi Adina Lewittes is quoted as saying that "while Conservative Judaism uses a halachic framework, the movement accepts the notion of halachic pluralism." The article further discusses women's having more rights due to the growing women's movement in our society, as well as a Conservative congregation's changing its religious policy, in part, due to a petition of congregants.

I must protest and state that to put the term Halachah in the same sentence as Conservative Judaism is an oxymoron. The religion, as defined by the Halachah in the Shulchan Aruch, the Mishnah Berura, and the Mishnah Torah of Maimonides, is basically a dictatorial religion which requires that the women must be separate from the men and may not perform religious functions in front of men. The Conservative movement has changed these laws for themselves. To couch these changes under the umbrella of Halachah is contrary to the religion.

If non-Orthodox Jews choose to make their religion more appealing to women, G-d bless them. But it is against Halachah, and please do not justify or try to legitimize these changes under the guise of Halachah.

The positive side of Israeli culture

Re: CJN's Hebrew column by Gidi Koren.

I too was in Israel at about the same time you were. Yet, how different our experiences.

News: When in Israel, as well as here, I read Ha'aretz — politics, financial news, sports, marvelous editorials and lots of cultural news, local and international. Translations of writers from all countries appear in Ha'aretz, material I cannot find in any Canadian newspaper.

Theatre: Israeli theatre ranks with London and Broadway. Have you seen Kfar, Tikkun Hatzot, Yehudi Bahoshech, V'Yomar V'Yelech? The list is long of outstanding first-class productions that are exported to various European festivals.

The bookstores are full of books by local talented writers in every sphere. I read five to six novels or autobiographies annually by Israeli writers in Hebrew and they are excellent.

Did you see Israeli films of the last five years? Some outstanding accomplishments.

Rigoletto: Have you seen the Israeli production?

It is my opinion that you, as a columnist, should at least be fair and present the positive alongside the negative.

Did my aunt and uncle survive

My sister, brother-in-law and myself have planned a family reunion for June of this year and it will be the first time that my father (Heinz Korn) and his four first cousins will be together in the same place again since 1938. Dad and his cousins were all born in Breslau, Germany, and fortunately they all survived the war.

One cousin (Ilse Korn) was sponsored by a couple of Catholic spinsters in England in 1938 and has lived there ever since. Unfortunately, her parents were unable to make it to England before the war started and they are thought to have died in Auschwitz at the end of 1943.

I am looking for information about Erich Korn and Lisbeth Scherbel.

Manning knows what makes us angry

Preston Manning says he thinks Paul Bernardo should have been executed for his crimes. And he has promised a referendum on the issue of capital punishment. Would he also like to execute David Milgard and Guy-Paul Morin? These innocent men were wrongfully convicted and might have been executed if Canada still made use of capital punishment.

As usual, Manning is very good at bringing out what makes us angry, but not very good at figuring out sensible alternatives.

Students need social centres on campus

Your piece "Crisis on Campus" and Alan Dershowitz' book The Vanishing American Jew raise great concerns about our next generation. You detail the absence of suitable meeting places for Jewish students on campuses, while Dershowitz writes about the disturbingly high rate of intermarriage.

Many students would welcome attractive, dynamic centres planned by and for the students themselves to assist with problems of university life.

Why must we bother? Simply because it is our fervent, deep seated wish that our children will marry in the faith.

JIAS history mirrors that of turbulent century

By HINDY NOSEK-ABELSON

This year marks the 75th anniversary of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) of Canada. A review of the history of JIAS affords the observer a snapshot of a turbulent 20th century. It therefore seems fitting as we prepare to enter the new millennium, to examine the symbiotic relationship between Jewish history and JIAS, and to publish a Community Heritage Book to mark the occasion.

At the beginning of the 20th century, Canada boasted a Jewish population of 10,000. For their Eastern European landsmen living in the Pale of Settlement, however, life had become unbearable. Trade barriers, denial of credit and heavy taxation were demoralizing the population. Church-sponsored anti-Semitism, blood-libels and scapegoat politics that bordered on fanaticism culminated in the Kishinev pogrom of 1903.

Pogroms that followed in 1918 and 1919 saw some 50,000 Jewish men, women and children massacred, sparking the largest exodus of Jews since the Spanish Inquisition — so much so, that despite a stringent immigration policy in Canada, according to JIAS records, the Jewish population swelled to over 100,000 after World War I.

To facilitate the entry of a beleaguered European Jewry, Canadian Jews had to combat restrictive immigration quotas which listed three categories for countries of origin — preferred, non-preferred and other. Most Jews came from non-preferred countries.

By 1919, the question of immigration was at the top of the community's list of priorities. At the first plenary assembly of a newly established Canadian Jewish Congress in Montreal, a resolution calling for the creation of a central Canadian bureau for Jewish immigration was passed. It was further resolved that a Jewish Immigrant Aid Society office be opened in Quebec, and on Aug. 30, 1922, JIAS was legally incorporated, with a $600 donation that covered its initial operating expenses. The Jewish Immigrant Aid Society of Canada was headquartered in Montreal and branches were established and agents dispatched to ports and railroad stations across the country wherever Jews settled.

In 1922, when 202 Jewish immigrants were slated for deportation from the port of St. John, officials from JIAS rushed to the rescue. As a result of their intervention, 193 were allowed into the country and only nine deported.

Some of the grateful newcomers wrote to JIAS. Following is a portion of one letter translated from Yiddish: "No words nor phrases can describe the feeling of the freed... the doors of Canada were about to be closed... and we were to be deported back to Europe with nothing to greet us there but suffering... Accept the only means with which we can thank you, that is, our blessings, from the depths of our hearts."

To protect new immigrants from hucksters and con artists, JIAS greeted them with handouts printed in Yiddish and English: "Don't give any money to anyone. Be careful of your tickets. The Jewish Immigrant Aid Society will help you free of charge with everything you need. Apply to our men in the Immigration Building. The address of our branches are as follows: 725 Notre Dame St. W., Montreal; 399 Spadina Ave., Toronto; 213 Selkirk Ave., Winnipeg."

No sooner had one group of Jews been rescued than another crisis emerged. By the mid to late '20s, ominous clouds again appeared over Europe with the rapid rise of the Nazi party.

In Canada, the Great Depression of the 1930s brought rigorous new immigration laws which stipulated that no one other than British subjects, U.S. citizens and a few privileged nationals were allowed entry. The timing could not have been worse for the Jews.

On Jan. 30, 1933, Hitler was appointed chancellor. In March 1933, an urgent telegram arrived from Paris, pleading with JIAS to convince Canadian authorities to admit German refugees. Every appeal landed on deaf ears. "The only hope for admission is to apply on a case by case basis," the minister of immigration advised. JIAS frantically began tracing Canadian relatives for German Jews, and German relatives for Canadian Jews. They prepared documentation for Canadian sponsors as well as for German Jews visiting Canada, who were terrified to return.

The Nuremberg Laws passed on Sept. 15, 1935, legally disenfranchised Jews. Their only chance of escape was emigration or death. In 1936, a JIAS delegation met with Canadian immigration authorities to request the admission of 100 Jewish families — with a promise to disperse them throughout the country. Anti-refugee forces created a clamor and the request was refused. Instead, the authorities permitted JIAS to assist only in the cases of German Jews who could bring capital in with them and where relatives were in a financial position to receive them. So, at a time when emigration from Germany was still possible, the doors to Canada were shut.

By the end of 1937, 140,000 Jews had fled Germany. Of these, 11,005 — a tiny fraction of Canada's total immigration figure — were admitted to Canada.

"Every movement to open the gates of Canada to refugees met with an anti-Semitic campaign," a JIAS representative reported. "This is a cause for pain... to the Jewish community... which has seen its own flesh and blood persecuted, shamed and decimated."

The outbreak of the war brought immigration to a standstill. As the Holocaust raged, Canadian advocates for Jewish immigration could save no one. JIAS, however, busied itself making plans for the mass migration that would come at the end of the war. Canadian Jewish Congress and JIAS became the lobbyists for a post-war rescue, while United Relief Agencies took on the responsibility of financing refugees and programs. A nation-wide list of European relatives was organized in preparation for a post-war search.

Rescue, resettlement and rehabilitation became the theme of JIAS' post-Holocaust efforts. As the war drew to an end, JIAS and Congress prevailed on the federal government to revise its closed door policy and records show that the government agreed to "participate in the rescue and resettlement of displaced persons from the emergency camps of post-war Europe."

In 1947, the War Orphans Project initiated in 1942 finally came to fruition. A trickle of survivors were admitted when JIAS helped immigrants from displaced persons camps in Europe to resettle across Canada. After the establishment of the State of Israel, the gates of Canada finally opened.

While the birth of a Jewish state was a joyous occasion, the climate became threatening to the Jewish populations of Arab countries. Large numbers emigrated to Israel from Morocco, Algeria, Egypt, Iran and Iraq. Like their Ashkenazi counterparts, they were forced to evacuate homes they had lived in for centuries and try to make a life in an alien climate. With the assistance of JIAS, many settled in Canada, where the traditions and culture they brought with them brought a renewed vitality to Canadian Jewish life.

Ten years ago, with the collapse of the Communist Bloc, the most recent mass exodus of Jews began as Russian Jews emigrated. Hungry for a taste of freedom and following in the footsteps of past migrations, some went to Israel, others to the United States, Canada, Western Europe and Australia.

Today JIAS is receiving and resettling Jewish immigrants in more than a dozen communities across Canada. Whether they come from Brazil, Argentina, Chile, South Africa, Poland, Russia, Hungary, Romania, the Czech Republic, the Balkans, North Africa or the Middle East, whether they come for economic or political reasons, they all share the same struggles — to survive, to adjust and to create a better Jewish life for themselves and their children.

In 1922, JIAS was founded to assist Jewish immigrants. In 1997, it is stronger than ever, helping immigrants with a vast array of programs, resettlement options, adjustment counselling, immigration consultation, financial assistance, English as Second Language (ESL) classes, employment counseling, job shadowing co-op programs in co-operation with Jewish Vocational Service, medical services, summer day camp subsidies, youth groups, after school programs, education scholarships, family to family programs, Judaica classes and more.

In 1950, at the age of three, I arrived in Halifax with my parents and boarded a train for Winnipeg. Their spirit had been broken by the war. We had no money, few belongings, fewer skills and not a word of English. JIAS helped get us on our feet. I remember the struggles of my parents and, while I have become solidly enmeshed in Canadian life, whenever I see immigrants, I empathize.

To celebrate their accomplishments of the last 75 years and to make certain that immigrants continue to get the assistance they deserve, proceeds from the 75th anniversary festivities will go toward education scholarships, day camp bursaries and employment retraining program. The JIAS Community Heritage Book and the Oct. 27 gala concert at the North York Recital Hall starring Theresa Tova, Mark Skazinetsky, Igor Gefter and Ralph Benmergui will help make these services possible.

With text and photos, the Heritage Book will take us on a visual journey of the history of the community. It will celebrate the diversity, the struggle and the triumphs of all of our immigrants' roots and give visual affirmation to the ties that bind us to the past. After all, a people who still remember their departure from Egypt aren't likely to forget their own immigrant roots.

Anyone interested in presenting their family, business or organization history can call Barbara Stupp at the JIAS office 416-630-6481.

Israel at 49 – Am Yisrael Chai

By Nava Press in Jerusalem

The fireworks exploded from the top of the Sheraton Hotel. The night sky was colored by the green, purple, gold, red and of course, blue and white sparkling lights. It was May 11 and I was out celebrating Israel's 49th birthday.

Israel's 49-year independence is in itself a great feat. But the number of people that filled the streets to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut is what really impressed me.

The main streets in downtown Jerusalem: Jaffa Road, King George, and Keren Hayesod, were closed to traffic. The steady flow of people armed with shaving cream, hair spray, silly string and plastic hammers took the place of the noisy cars and buses.

Candy floss, candy apples, corn on the cob and balloons were sold by vendors lining the streets. Israeli flags were everywhere: hanging from lampposts, rooftops, balconies. Even the cars have a special flag that attaches to the windows. Jerusalem, and in fact all of Israel, was cloaked in blue and white.

This was the biggest birthday party I have ever attended. And the reason for the whole affair was important to all Jews: a celebration for the independence of our homeland.

My night started with dinner at Amigos, a restaurant on Rechov Yoel Solomon. Yoel Solomon Street intersects with the main promenade, Ben Yehuda Street, which is right in the centre of the action.

While my friend Ahron and I ate, we watched the flow of people passing by. There were children with their parents, couples – old and young, teenagers, Israelis and tourists, religious and secular — everyone was out celebrating.

Some people walked by swinging their inflatable hammers and bopping other people on the head. Others passed by singing songs for Israel, including the song Am Yisrael Chai. And some people just went with the flow.

But everyone was happy. Everyone was celebrating the State of Israel.

After dinner, we walked down Rechov Yoel Solomon to the park behind the Sheraton. There we sat on the grass with hundreds of other people watching local musicians perform on stage. A man selling helium balloons in the shapes of Disney characters made his way through the crowd.

At approximately 10:30 p.m., the bands stopped playing and our attention was directed to the roof of the Sheraton Hotel where the fireworks display showered fire-lights over the park making everything look magical.

Ahron and I decided not to stay for the next band. Instead, we wanted to check out the other celebrations taking place throughout the city.

We walked up Jaffa Road to City Hall. As we got closer to City Hall, we could hear lively Israeli music. Here was rikudiyah, Israeli dancing.

Although I learned Israeli dancing while I was at Hebrew day school in Toronto and during my summers at Young Judaea camps, I was unfamiliar with these dances. They were far more complex with moves that made the tango look easy. Nonetheless, it was exciting to watch this group of energetic people performing.

There were group, couples' and line dancing. Everyone was welcome to join in. For some of the more popular dances, those of us watching were pushed back to give the dancers more room.

It was nearing one in the morning, and although this is far from late during Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations, I was exhausted.

Because the main roads were closed to cars and buses, the only way back to my aunt's place where I was staying, was by foot.

We walked down Jaffa Road to Ben Yehuda. The number of people still in the streets emphasized that the party was still going on.

Even on my aunt's street, in the normally quiet Katamon area of Jerusalem, people congregated in groups marking the special day.

I had shaving cream in my hair, hair spray on my clothes and a sore head from being hit by the hammers. But none of that mattered. This was the best birthday party I have ever been to. Even better than the Yom Ha'atzmaut I celebrated in Tel Aviv in 1994.

And I'm even more happy that this year, I was able to celebrate Israel's 49 years of independence in the capital city, Jerusalem.

I look forward to another Yom Ha'atzmaut in Israel.

I will be living in Jerusalem for the summer and it is from here that my next three columns will be written.

Continuity requires imput from youth

By Justin Korda in Montreal

Last year I attended the World Jewish Congress (WJC) convention in Jerusalem. At the conference, Edgar Bronfman, president of WJC, made the issue of student activism and student inclusion in the organized Jewish community a top priority. He emphasized the importance of this issue in several ways, demonstrating his sincere care for the survival of the Jewish people.

Bronfman demanded that the adult delegates at the convention invite students to sit at their tables during meals and listen to the needs expressed by the students. He also managed to fit in a special meeting with the student delegates, despite his packed schedule. By the end of the convention, it was obvious, and comforting, that this leader of the Jewish community truly understood that without real input from the young, Jewish continuity would be in peril.

The Jewish world today is in a position where its current leaders cannot have the jurisdiction to make the decisions that will affect tomorrow's leaders, for if they make these decisions without the input of tomorrow's leaders, failure is inevitable. Although this may seem uncomplimentary, it is not so in the slightest.

Today's Jewish leaders built up a strong and vibrant worldwide Jewish community out of the ashes of Europe, in order to ensure that their children and grandchildren would not face further Jewish destruction. Today's leaders can be commended on a job that truly could not have been done better. They have built a Jewish community that is strong, alleviating many of the outside threats that have existed against international Jewry throughout history. This strength, however, is the source of the newest factor threatening the Jewish people.

And as a result of normalization of Jewry into the international community, more and more Jews find themselves asking why Judaism is important at all? Unfortunately, they are not finding answers.

There is, however, a light at the end of the tunnel — if one chooses to open one's eyes and see it. There are Jewish students today who for some miraculous reason actually do care. These students should be handed part of the responsibility of keeping the Jewish people alive, for the students of today are the leaders of tomorrow. These students are personally in touch with the spiritual and physical needs of their generation. They must be given the resources and the power to satisfy these needs. Without the input of today's students in shaping the future Jewish community, today's leaders, I'm sorry to say, don't stand a chance of succeeding.

It is not enough for students to simply be invited to sit on community committees as token youth in order to ease the conscience of the community's leadership. The students must be heard and their opinions should be applied, for they are the ones who know what the future Jewish community will require. Although the planning of events and programs by the organized Jewish community and the attempt that is being made to get students involved are appreciated, it will become apparent that this effort is futile if the "planning for" as opposed to "planning with" approach continues.

Today's students must also be bold in demanding change and this change should be accepted, even welcomed. Students cannot shy away from putting forth their needs and the organized community should be eager to respond, realizing that satisfying these needs will be the assurance that Jewish vibrancy will continue.

The ultimate purpose of the organized Jewish community is to protect the existence of present Jewry and to ensure its continuation in the future. This purpose, however, sometimes becomes clouded by personal agendas, political leanings and procedural differences. This cloudiness is counterproductive and very costly. Fortunately, there are many leaders and organizations that believe this and conduct their work accordingly. I only hope that the rest of the community follows with this leap in ideology, making this joint effort of today's and tomorrow's leaders the mainstream. Time, however, is of the essence, and the longer it takes for this change to occur, the dimmer the light gets at the end of the tunnel.

Bronfman is one leader who truly understands this, as he proved when he promised us students that if we find an ingredient that can positively impact on the struggle for Jewish continuity, the resources, funds and support to make the idea a reality will be made available. Apparently though, this is one of those things that is easier said than done, as it seems that Bronfman's promise has not been endorsed by many segments of the organized Jewish community.

The protection and survival of the Jewish people in the future depend on new factors that the Jewish people have never before faced. These factors predominantly involve the fulfilment of the needs of today's Jewish youth. I beg today's organized community to use the human resources that they have created, namely, the concerned Jewish students. These students are ready, able and available to be heard. They have to be listened to.

Tiger's success raises race question

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Among the many fascinating aspects of the Tiger Woods phenomenon is the recurring question of his "race." He objects to being called a black — not because he is ashamed of it, quite the contrary — but because he is also of Asian-Native-American-Indian-and-Caucasian ancestry. Of course, in the North American context, the perception that he is black is predominant: he looks the part, and the prejudices we have acquired over the centuries are transferred automatically to someone who even remotely resembles the young golfer.

His own denial of the racial ascription, however, is something that deserves emphasis. For it points out that the entire subject of race — targeted a little over 100 years ago as a subject for serious study — is scientifically of dubious standing, if it has any standing at all. From time to time, certain academics come along who try to bolster the importance of so-called racial differences with particular types of research: calling one race more intelligent than another or exhibiting other distinctions that don't particularly matter. But since we do like our prejudice, black, white, Asian and Caucasian are expressions that will be with us for a little while longer. Meanwhile, the prominence of Tiger Woods has given a lot of disadvantaged youngsters hope that they too might reach for fame and fortune, but it takes someone as extraordinary as this young man to reach the heights.

Part of the fascination with Tiger's success has to do with the sport in which he excels. We have come to accept the excellence of non-white athletes everywhere except in golf. There, private clubs still discriminate and non-whites are rarely seen (some of them won't let a Jew in either). This is not to say that blacks will suddenly find ready entry into some of our exclusive golf clubs — it will take a while before that happens.

Meanwhile, it is fair to say that every minority has shepped naches from the young golfer's phenomenal success. I think most Jews have greeted his achievement with special pleasure, for many of us remember what prejudice does to the one on whom it is visited.

Censuses still insist on asking us questions about color, background, religion and other matters that should play no role in the rational consciousness. We are told that this is important for statistics. Of course, one can assemble data on anything, but the very asking gives the respondent the impression that it is important for the nation.

Obviously, the government has to ask our age, for it must calculate when Old Age and Canada Pension payments fall due. But I think it would send a powerful message to everyone if religion and race were removed from public snooping and were thereby declared irrelevant to common concerns, although that won't eliminate prejudice and we'll still need human rights codes and their protection.

Meanwhile, our speech often betrays how we think. It bothers me no end that from time to time, I hear a Jew make derogatory jokes about blacks. Jokes often reveal the racism behind them, and it behooves us to guard our speech even as we must guard our hearts. Racial prejudice is not only bad or wrong, it is also un-Jewish.

Election '97

BQ leader Gilles Duceppe

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After June 2, the Bloc Québécois intends to continue to actively promote the idea of Quebec sovereignty in the federal political arena, party leader Gilles Duceppe told the Canadian Jewish News in an interview. The man who, until recently, was head of the official Opposition in Ottawa, also gave us his thoughts on other topics.

As in every federal election, The CJN sought interviews with the leaders of the major parties. Only Gilles Duceppe agreed. The NDP specifically called to say Alexa McDonough would not be available because of health reasons and scheduling difficulties. The other three parties were simply unavailable.

CJN: What will be the chief priorities of the Bloc Québécois delegation elected on June 2?
Gilles Duceppe: We firmly intend to continue to defend specific issues where Quebec's interests are at stake and to actively promote our sovereigntist plan. These two items go hand in hand because the political option we are proposing has concrete implications for everyday life in areas involving the interests of the Québécois.

CJN: You seem to be obsessed with the thorny question of Quebec sovereignty. However, the most recent polls show clearly that that option is losing ground in Quebec. Since 1980, the sovereigntists have been defeated twice. Yet you persist. If the Yes vote wins the next referendum by a very narrow margin, how will you confer legitimacy to a result that is not unanimous?
G.D.: It is not good to put too much faith in polls. At the beginning of the last referendum campaign, the polls predicted that the Yes side would get only 40 percent of the votes. One thing is certain: We have no illusions about the results of the next referendum. The sovereigntist camp will certainly not receive 80 percent of the votes. I believe it is the rules of democracy that must take precedence. As soon as the Yes side wins, we must immediately open negotiations with Canada and negotiate in the interests of both nations. That is how things happen in a democracy. We had the reverse situation in 1995 and we respected the result. Quebec is still part of Canada; we continue to pay our taxes to Ottawa.

I am convinced that we will succeed in reaching a new agreement with Canadians. They are also tired of all the discussions. The partnership we are proposing is, without doubt, the best solution for two nations who have known each other for a long time, who have never truly settled their differences and who have for the first time the opportunity to get to know each other again and to share things in a free and voluntary way. That is the modern path we are proposing to English Canada.

The sovereigntists were not the ones who invented that concept. I remember that the former secretary general of the United Nations, Boutros Boutros-Ghali declared in Montreal in May 1992 that there are two trends in the modern world: one that encourages peoples and nations to build a sovereign country, and another that prompts countries to create broadly based economic organizations such as the common markets of NAFTA. The latter is the way of the future.

I do not see why it would pose such a big problem to Canadians to have a sovereign nation called Quebec living side by side with them, as does their American neighbor to the south.

CJN: Won't sovereignty have disastrous repercussions on the economy of Quebec?
G.D.: I want to remind you that there are countries that are much less stable than Quebec, and they are not shunned by Canadian and foreign investors. Take for example the Bombardier investments in Northern Ireland. We have also just signed free trade agreements with Mexico and the State of Israel. Isn't there greater socio-political stability in Quebec than in Mexico? And you will surely agree that the political situation in Quebec is much more stable than the one currently existing in Israel. I am not at all thrilled by what is happening in Israel, but the statement seems obvious to me.

Would you advise businesspeople not to invest in Israel because there is a political problem which, I believe, is much more acute than the one in Quebec? You would not say that, I am convinced. Then why say that it is dangerous to invest in Quebec?

CJN: Will the rights of minorities be protected and respected within the framework of a sovereign Quebec? Isn't the sovereigntists' position somewhat vague on that subject?
G.D.: Our position on that subject is not at all vague. For us, all those who live in Quebec, no matter what their origin and their language, are full-fledged members of the Québécois nation. That position was explicitly reiterated in the agreement signed by the three parties supporting the sovereigntist option before the last referendum.

For us, the collective rights of the anglophone minority that controls its own education network — from elementary level to university — and its own social institutions are an immutable given. Those rights will be guaranteed in the constitution of a sovereign Quebec. Moreover, we have also reached specific agreements with certain cultural communities, including the Jewish community, especially about schools... The contribution of anglophones to Quebec society is a richness that we must preserve at all cost.

CJN: Since the last referendum, relations between the leaders of the movement for independence and the cultural communities of Quebec seem to be deteriorating, especially because of Jacques Parizeau's words about minorities. In your opinion, what is the current state of those relations?
G.D.: We are working very hard to rebuild bridges with the cultural communities. However, in daily life, relations seem to me to be very good... The sovereigntists have made a great deal of effort on relations with cultural groups. We are very conscious that that rapprochement will not mean a large increase in sympathy for sovereignty. However, we believe it is necessary. It is a question of working together on those values we have in common and the causes that we can defend jointly.

CJN: Does the Bloc Québécois support Canada's foreign policy in the Middle East? What will be the diplomatic position of an independent Quebec with respect to the Israeli-Arab conflict?
G.D.: The Bloc supported the peace accords between the Palestinian Authority and the State of Israel. Like many other political parties, we do not agree with Israeli settlement of the territories. I believe our position on that subject is quite close to that of a significant portion of Israeli public opinion, which objects to the policy of settlement. We believe it would be much better to put all one's energy into the peace process. Our position also reflects that of the Israeli Labor party.

As for the Mideast foreign policy of a sovereign Quebec, it would be for the party which forms the government of the new independent state to define the broad orientation of that policy. I myself think that we would be linked by the broad, common values that unite Quebec and Israel, namely a democratic state concerned with the respect of all its citizens. We are both people who should understand each other well. The Québécois are fighting to have a country. I am persuaded that Israelis will understand us well; they have already been there.

Halachah designed to aid Jewish people

By RABBI Y. BENAMOU and GARY DOLOVITCH

Parshas Bechukosai, which closes the book of Vayikra, begins with the following words (Lev. 33:3): "Im Bechukosai telechu," (If you will walk in My decrees).

The parshah tells us that if the Jewish people choose to "walk" in G-d's decrees, observe His commandments, and perform them, there is the promise of great reward. There is also, however, the threat of very severe punishment if the Jewish people choose a different path. Both the promise of blessing and the threat of curse are tied inextricably to walking in G-d's decrees — to following his Halachah.

What then is Halachah? Rabbi Henry Hoschander describes it this way: "Briefly, it is the myriad of rules and regulations, biblical and post-biblical, rabbinic exegesis and responsa, stretching from the dawn of the Jewish faith to the present, designed to aid and abet the Jew in his magnificent struggle for spiritual self-fulfilment and Divine realization…Halachah is simply living Judaism, the faith which every Jew must profess, the principles by which he must be guided, and the practices in which he must walk."

This definition stresses that Halachah is a "living Judaism." This means that it is as binding on today's generation as on past generations. It also means that the laws are binding in their entirety.

The term Halachah is often translated as "Jewish law." Such translation, however, leads potentially to confusing Halachah (Jewish law) with civil law.

Modern civil law is seen as having no legitimate role outside the public domain. Civil law-making authorities are seen by many as having no right to legislate on what are believed to be purely private moral choice issues. Then prime minister Pierre Trudeau summed up this viewpoint when he uttered the famous line that Parliament had no business in the bedrooms of the nation.

Halachah, by contrast, is very concerned with what goes on in the bedrooms of the Jewish people. And not only in their bedrooms, but in their homes and at their dinner tables as well. Halachah is concerned with and addresses each and every aspect of a Jewish person's life. The Torah makes clear that G-d cares deeply about everything a person does. There are no areas outside HaShem's jurisdiction.

Thus, Halachah has to be understood as describing and defining the right way to live as a Jewish person in all areas, both "public" and "private." Its root being holech meaning "to walk," Jewish "law," G-d's commandments, set out the path that the Jew must travel in life.

Now that we know what the Halachah is, we must go the next step and try to find out what it asks of us. Again, comparison to the civil framework is helpful.

Civil law and the secular ethic are directed at making good citizens. Good citizens care about their neighbors and the world in which they live. They do not commit crimes. They are careful that their actions will not injure others, even accidentally. They vote. They pay taxes. They care about the environment. They volunteer. They try to be good people.

Unquestionably, Jewish law demands that Jews be good citizens. But it also demands more. G-d, through his commandments, through the Halachah, demands from each and every Jew that he or she strive to be holy. Being a good person and living up to a very high standard of behavior is only one very important part of that.

Holiness comes through the sanctification of the physical act in this world: We sanctify those acts by adding an element of G-dliness to everything we do. As Jews, as part of a holy nation, we are expected to imbue our everyday actions — how we eat, what we eat, how we mark time, and even how we make love with our spouses — with holiness. In the words of Rabbi Henry Hoschander, "The pre-eminent function of Halachah is to guide man toward this goal."

Once we accept that Halachah is part of every aspect of a person's life, it becomes obvious that understanding the broad principles can only be the beginning, because sanctifying all that we do requires an understanding of how to put these principles into daily, continual practice. We must learn so that we can perform.

Although following a halachic way of life imposes many obligations, it gives much more than it demands. Anyone who has practised Judaism faithfully can attest to the sense of satisfaction and connectedness to G-d which it provides. Although its practice does not promise and does not always deliver an overwhelming feeling of joy in the same way as, perhaps, hearing a majestic symphony might (although the symphony too is from G-d), it gives something much more. It connects a person directly to the very revelation at Sinai and puts him or her on the path to G-dliness. The Halachah is G-d's gift to the Jewish people. May we all work faithfully to merit its rewards.

Rabbi Benamou is the spiritual leader of the Herzlia Adas Yerushun Synagogue in Winnipeg.

Jewish Life

Following the paper trail

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

After years of doing family tree research, I have amassed hundreds of documents, articles, papers, photographs and illustrations relating to my ancestors and relatives, dating from roughly 1808 to the present.

Besides the expected assortment of civil records and census lists, my carefully-organized boxes of files contain passenger lists, wills, notices of bankruptcy, tax assessment rolls, naturalizations, school records, old letters and other unique items that each open a window onto the past.

One such treasure beckoned from the pages of the yizkor or memorial book for Konin, Poland: a drawing of the rabbi who married my great-great-grandparents, Raphael and Rudescz Glicenstein, in 1846. Another is a rare photo of the house at 19 Eden Place in Toronto's Bathurst-Queen neighborhood that my great-grandfather, Harris Glickstein, purchased about 1914, shortly after arriving in Canada.

Alas, the house was demolished about 40 years ago. Although evidently no one in my family possessed a photo of it, one materialized quite by chance, courtesy of a former neighbor of my great-grandfather whom I encountered at a meeting of the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada.

As this incident suggests, one can learn or acquire much in regard to family history from living sources. As veteran genealogists will advise, your best first step is to interview parents, grandparents, aunts, uncles, relatives, even former neighbors – generally the older the better.

Since it's guaranteed that your subjects won't be around forever, don't wait to start your investigations. The most common regret expressed by experienced researchers is that they didn't act soon enough to interview senior relatives who could have provided valuable details of family history or solved lingering mysteries.

Still, living memory has a rather shallow horizon that can usually be measured in decades. The next logical step is to follow the paper trail that your ancestors left behind, which might easily go back centuries.

Records were kept of life-cycle events for most Jews who lived in this and the previous century. The name of each of your ancestors was probably penned many times into Jewish communal pinkassim, synagogue record books and civic registers. It's your job as a genealogist to uncover whatever documentary evidence exists of their passage through the world.

To choose one illustrative example, I've uncovered numerous documents related to the life of my great-grandfather's brother, Nathan.

Even though I had done extensive family interviews, I had never heard of Nathan until I listened to a taped conversation that my brother had fortuitously conducted with my grandfather (since deceased) about 20 years ago. Here are some items subsequently found:

• 1859: Polish-language birth record from Konin shows Nathan as son of Rafael Glicenstein, a combmaker aged 40, and his wife Rudescz née Hahn, aged 28.

• 1888 (July 10): Record of the Burial Society of the United Synagogue, London, England, for unnamed child, the "abortion of Nathan Glechenstein."

• 1888 (July 13): Burial Society record showing death of Eva Glichtenstein, age 29, due to "effects of parturition," the wife of "Nathan son of Raphael" (in Hebrew).

• 1891: British census shows Nathan Glick, 28 (sic), widower, a tailor, born in Russia-Poland, living with his brother Morris Glickstein and assorted other family members.

• 1896: Civic marriage document showing Nathan Glitzstone, 30, a tailor, the son of Raphael Glitzstone, deceased, of Liverpool, marrying Rosa Delepa, formerly Bernstein, 25, the divorced wife of Abraham Delepa.

Various Canadian sources, including a 1943 tombstone, provide more details. Thus, from knowing nothing of my great-great-uncle, I've recovered a bare outline of his life story, seemingly plucked from the ether of time.

Like his brothers Harris and Morris, Nathan has many descendants in Toronto. They include great-grandson Randy Starkman, award-winning sports writer for the Toronto Star, and great-grandson Russell Gillman, whose wife Vera is the assistant general manager of The Canadian Jewish News.

Following a paper trail can ultimately lead you to living relatives and make you realize the deep familial bonds that unite the Jewish people all over the world.

Anti-Semitism's origins

The Crucified Jew
by Dan Cohn-Sherbok
(Eerdmans Pub., paper, $18)

The origins and persistence of anti-Semitism remain a mystery. For many scholars the primary causes are religious. The teaching that Jews killed Jesus made the perpetrators not only hateful, but also terrifying. After all, a people with super-human powers could "murder" God.

It is no wonder that images of Jews as evil and satanic were encouraged by the early Church fathers. The Crusades exploited the inflammatory doctrine to demonize Jews. Zealous crusaders on their way to the Holy Land burned and pillaged Jewish communities. Luther carried the pernicious mess into the Reformation and the idea of the Jew as a primordial sinner became part of the catechism taught to children.

It was this religious anti-Semitism, often mixed with mystical overtones, that eventually found a welcome haven in the secular, demented thinking of Hitler.

Shortly after the war, the great Protestant historian James Parkes stated flatly: "In our day and within our own civilization, more than six million deliberate murders are the consequence of teaching about Jews for which the Christian Church is ultimately responsible, and of an attitude toward Judaism that is not only maintained by all the Christian Churches, but has its ultimate resting place in the teaching of the New Testament itself."

Yosef Yerushalami however, a well known Israeli scholar, has argued that if genocide had been latent in Christian teaching, an attempt at extermination would have come about in the Middle Ages when the church held real power to enforce its beliefs.

The focus of this book on the underlying Christian religious hostility to Judaism and the Jewish people is proper and reasonable, but the author acknowleges that the causes of anti-Semitism are complex and numerous: political, social, psychological, cultural and economic.

The author touches on anti-Semitism in North America, especially on the part of blacks. "According to recent research, 37 percent of blacks, as opposed to 20 percent of whites practise some forms of anti-Semitism. It is unclear what steps Jews can take to mitigate this widespread hostility in the black community." Once staunch allies in the battle against hatred, what each group needs from the other is a strong dose of sensitivity and understanding of their respective fears and needs and the importance of working together against the bigotry directed at both.

Dr. Cohn-Sherbok teaches Jewish theology in a British university and is the author of many books on Jewish subjects. He is not without hopes as he recognizes attempts among various Christians and Christian groups to find ways to transcend the legacy of anti-Semitism. "It is vital that both Christians and Jews affirm that they are heirs of a fearful tradition. It is only through this realization, and through the recognition that both traditions emerge from a common source, that harmony can be achieved."

This survey of the persecution of Jews from ancient times to the present is easy to read, well-balanced and comprehensive.

Theodore Bikel concert to aid Beit Halochem

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — Film star, theatre and concert performer, Theodore Bikel, known for his many diverse roles, will return to Toronto June 2 for an exclusive gala concert at the Ford Centre for Performing Arts in support of Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel (Canada), Beit Halochem.

Special guests Raoul, Klezmer à la Québécois, will also be featured. Composed of four Montreal musicians who first met at Quebec City's Laval University, the band's klezmer music has captivated audiences at some of Montreal's most popular night spots.

Bikel, who was directed by Sir Laurence Olivier in A Streetcar Named Desire and Peter Ustinov in The Love of Four Colonels, has starred in some 35 films including The Russians Are Coming, My Fair Lady and The Defiant Ones, for which he received an Academy Award nomination.

Last year on a cross country tour, Bikel appeared in Toronto as Tevye in Fiddler on the Roof, a role he has performed 1,002 times.

Tevye and Zorba, he said in an interview from his home in Connecticut, are his two favorite roles, adding that while Tevye and Zorba are both older men of ethnic backgrounds, the similarities end there.

Bikel has starred in many dramatic TV shows. His performance in the television docudrama Harris Newmark's Los Angeles won him an Emmy Award for his memorable portrayal of Newmark, a German Jew who was a pioneer in the 19th century. The show depicts the life of Jews who settled in the U.S. West.

Born in Vienna, Bikel and his family left for Palestine when he was 13. He describes the country of his youth as "a very interesting place where no one locked their door." Living in Tel Aviv, he attended an agricultural school and went to work on Kibbutz Kfar Hamaccabi near Haifa. He soon learned that he had no talent for agriculture.

He joined the Habimah Theatre at 19 and a year later, co-founded the Israel Chamber Theatre. He went on to study at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Arts in London, graduated with honors and appeared in several West End plays.

In the United States, his memorable stage performances included Tonight in Samarkand and The Sound of Music, in which he created the role of Baron von Trapp.

An accomplished concert artist and raconteur who performs more than 60 concerts each year, he has recorded some 20 albums.

Bikel, who has been active in professional associations such as the Actors' Equity Association, is currently president of the Associated Actors and Artists of America. He also has a deep commitment to the Jewish community.

"I have always been involved in the Jewish community, culturally, linguistically, ethnically and politically," he says.

He serves as a senior vice-president of the American Jewish Congress and he is active in keeping Yiddish alive, "both as an artist and a Jew." He supports numerous projects to preserve Yiddish books and to see that they are read.

"You have to work at being Jewish just as you have to work at being a human being — it does not come as a birthright alone."

He believes that just being born Jewish doesn't make you a Jew. "It takes trips to the bookshelves because you have to look back if you want to look forward."

He believes that "any muscle that isn't used atrophies and that holds true for the Jewish muscle or any cultural muscle."

Recently, Bikel completed a two-month run in Florida of Sholom Aleichem Lives, based on that writer's short stories. Adapted to English with music, the first half of the show is about music and humor in the shtetl. The second half tells of what happens when the music and humor come to America. He says he hopes to take the show on tour.

In his concert in Toronto, Bikel will perform a program of international songs including Yiddish and Israeli music as well as classic Broadway and folk melodies.

Beit Halochem is a rehabilitation and sports facility for disabled veterans with four locations in Israel: Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa and Nahariya. Each facility is designed to meet the needs — physical, psychological and social — of the more than 47,000 disabled war veterans in Israel today. All funds raised from this concert will go to purchase medical, rehabilitation and sports equipment for the Beit Halochem centres.

Razin leaving Beth Tikvah after 22 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Stuart Razin

TORONTO — After 22 years, the man some people know as Mr. Beth Tikvah is retiring from his position as director of fundraising and director of adult-centred activities at the Bayview Avenue congregation.

Stuart Razin, 56, will be honored at a gala tribute dinner June 19 and at Shabbat morning services two days later. Guest speaker for both occasions will be Rabbi Irving (Yitz) Greenberg, president and co-founder of CLAL, The National Jewish Center for Learning and Leadership. The two men have known each other since 1959, when Razin was a student in the first class the rabbi taught at Yeshiva University's Yeshiva College.

A native of Chelsea, Mass., where his late father was ritual director of their synagogue, Razin spent a dozen years working for three synagogues in succession before leaving the United States to join Beth Tikvah as director of education and youth.

As chair of the Toronto principals supplementary school council, he started the first English Bible contest for supplementary schools. At the time Beth Tikvah had the largest supplementary school, based on number of students and number of hours. A Hebrew high school also fell under Razin's aegis, and he inaugurated Tikvat Hayim, a Hebrew school for children with learning disabilities.

What drew Razin and his wife Marsha to Beth Tikvah originally was the then eight-year-old congregation's traditionalism, "pioneering spirit" and sense of membership involvement — exemplified to him by the presence of 24 people seated around the table at his initial interview.

"It was a very exciting atmosphere. We felt ultimately it would be the right thing, to build with the synagogue."

With a foot in the door of both Orthodox and Conservative movements (Marsha is head of Social Studies at the Bnei Akiva high schools), the Razins enjoyed Beth Tikvah's focus on "just trying to build a Jewish community. It didn't matter whether your children went to Hebrew school or day school...We've been here to help people grow in their Jewishness."

The Razins and their three children were welcomed warmly by the congregation and they became known for reciprocating a personal interest.

Razin has "really gone out of his way to know and show his caring for each of the members. He has an encyclopedic knowledge of families — who does what, and names of different people," said Ken Krupat, 31, a former student of Razin's who went on to become youth director at Beth Tikvah and more recently served as the shul's co-director of adult education.

Razin has "definitely had a very good and very wonderful influence on me," said Krupat.

A variety of awards on his office wall testify to the influence he's had in different capacities at Beth Tikvah.

In the 1980s Razin's career took a new turn when he became executive director and played a major role in the growth of the synagogue from 600 families in 1980 to 1200 in 1990.

Past synagogue president Irwin Fefergrad described Razin as "dedicated and committed. There was nothing he would refuse to do, as long as it advanced the cause of Judaism, even in a remote way. He's a great guy. He made my presidency an absolute joy and pleasure."

For Razin, Beth Tikvah hasn't been just a place to work. He likened it to having another child, but "it just so happened it was 1,000 families."

Second generation conference

TORONTO — Toronto's second conference for children of Holocaust survivors will take place Sunday, June 8 at the Lipa Green Building (4600 Bathurst St.)

Entitled Generation to Generation: The Legacy Continues, the day-long conference will feature individual workshops on issues facing children of survivors.

Speakers will include U.S. private investigator Steve Rambam, who personally found over 100 alleged Nazi war criminals in Canada; author Ken Vegotsky; Elaine Todres, president of the Baycrest Foundation; and Paul Litwack, described as a "capability improvement coach."

Registration is $65. For details, call 416-631-5689.

ייִדיש ווינקל

רעדאגירט פון ש. ליפשיץ

מען זוכט כּמדר צו אַנטדעקן נייע וועלטן

פון אַלעק סילווער

אירפוּאַקסנדיק איז אַ קליין פּוילישׁ־ייִדיש שטעטל, איז דער באַגריף „ענע" וועלט געקומען זייער פרי אין מיין לעבן. דער אויס־דרוק „ענע" וועלט איז געוואָרן כּמעט טאָג־טעגלעך אין ייִדישן לעבן. איז עמעצער געשטאַרבן, פלעגט מען זאָגן: „ער איז שוין אויף ענער וועלט". (בלוּט ביי רביים אין צדיקים האָט מען געזאָגט די ווערטער: „עולם הבא"). האָט זיך ווער צעקלאַפּט אַדער געקראָגן אַ וויטיק אין קערפּער, האָט ער זיך דערשׂראָקן און גע־מיינט, אז: „ער גייט שוין אויטעק אויף ענער וועלט". האָט מען געוואָלט באַצייכענען עפּעס אַ מרשעת, האָט מען גענאָגט: „ער איז אַ מכשפה פון ענער וועלט". איז ווער געווען קראַנק און שלעכט אויסגעזען, האָט מען אויף אים אַנגעוויזן, אז: „ער זעט אויס ווי איינער פון ענער וועלט". כאָטש קיינער האָט נאָך נישט געהאַט געזען „אַ גאַסט" פון ענער וועלט. ביי אונדז אויפן הויף האָט געוואוינט אַ פאַרפאַלק, וואָס האָט זיך שטענדיק געקריגט און גע־שאָלטן. איר באַליבטע קללה צום מאָן איז געווען: „כּזאָל דאָך נאָר האָבן אויף ענער וועלט". זיינען די קינדער געווען אַ ביסל צו שטיפערייש אַדער אַנגעטאָן דער מאַמען צארנט, פלעגט זי זיי פאַר־וואַרפן: „איר ווילט מיך שיקן אויף ענער וועלט".

איך וועט מסתמא זיכער געדענקען, אז אומגעפער מיט אַ האַלב יאָר צוריק האָט זיך פאַרשפּרייט די נייַעס, אז מען האָט גע־פונען אַ נייַע וועלט אויפן פלאַנעט מאַרס. די פרעסע האָט זיך צע־שריבן, די טעלעוויזיע און ראַדיאָ האָבן זיך צעהילכט: „מען האָט געפונען אַ נייַע וועלט אויפן מאַרס". וי האָט מען גענאָגט בּיי אונדז אין שטעטל: „אַ גרויסע גדולה האָט זיי געטראָפן!"

עס איז באַקאַנט, אז שוין יאָרן מיט יאָרן זוכן וויסנשאַפטס־מענטשן נייַע וועלטן אין די רויטמען אָרום אונדזער פלאַנעט „ערד". מען פאַרשט די שטערן און מזלות, וואָס ריגלען אונדז אָרום; מען שיקט אַרויס אין חלל קלאַנג־סיגנאַלן און מען דערוואַרט אַן ענט־פער. אָבער ביז איצט — גאָרנישט.

מיט אַ היפּש ביסל יאָרן צוריק האָט מען געפונען, דוכט זיך אין אַנטאַרקטיקע, אַ „שטיין" אַדער אַ בראָכטיל פון אַ „מעטע־אָר", וואָס קומט פון אַן אַנדערער וועלט. לויט דער מיינונג פון די „מבינים" קומט עס פון רויטן פלאַנעט מאַרס. מען האָט דעם „שטיין" שטודירט און שטודירט פאַר צענדליקער יאָרן. מען האָט אויף אים געקוקט מיט אַ שפּאָקטיוו און מיט נאָך שטאַרקערע פאַרגרעסער־גלעזער. מען האָט גענוצט כּמעטש אופן אויבערפלאַך פון „שטיין" אַ לאַנגן, דינעם „דים", גראָב ווי אַ מענטשלעכע האָר.

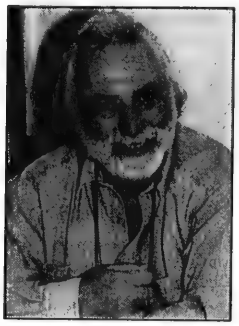
Community Matters

GOLDHAR TO CHAIR 1998 UJA FEDERATION CAMPAIGN

Leo Goldhar is the leader of UJA Federation's 1998 campaign and the new Chairman - a successful real estate developer - is marshalling all his influence to develop an asset with a value that cannot be measured in dollars — our children.



Leo Goldhar

"In today's Jewish world, tomorrow's rewards depend on the welfare of our children," explains Goldhar, who intends to speak forcefully about how UJA Federation donations assist children here at home, in Israel and around the world.

Goldhar, the founder of First Professional Management Inc., a real estate development company, which he runs with sons Stephen and Mitchell, says his parents had a lot to do with his strong commitment to community and desire to make a difference.

"My parents provided my sister Dorothy and I with many advantages and always taught us to share with others less fortunate," he says. Goldhar believes he inherited his mother's "wise business sense" and his father's "compassion for helping others." Sam and Rose Goldhar owned and operated a convenience store and delicatessen on St. Clair Avenue West. The store's back room served as the Goldhar's home for many years. Sam Goldhar was one of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation's founding members when the shul was located on St. Clair.

In 1970, Goldhar began his own real estate development and construction company which has built housing subdivisions and commercial complexes throughout Metro Toronto.

Goldhar has been a UJA Federation supporter for more than 30 years. However, becoming less involved in the company has allowed him to become more involved with what he considers "the most important organization in the Jewish community." He insists Toronto's "highly developed Jewish communal infrastructure would not exist today if it weren't for the work of UJA Federation."

In 1995, Goldhar co-chaired UJA Federation's Construction Division and a year later he helped to create the highly successful King David's Circle, which raised close to an additional $450,000 for the 1997 campaign. Today, the division is headed by Lionel Robins and former UJA Federation Vice-Chair Michael Daren.

Goldhar has also been instrumental in developing corporate sponsorship initiatives with the broader business community. "UJA Federation's connection with the Jewish community is unique and widespread," says Goldhar. "Companies which become sponsors and supporters can benefit greatly from attaching their name to ours."

Goldhar credits family support and encouragement for his decision to accept the 1998 chairmanship, a role which he assumes with "honour."

"I wanted a leadership role so I could increase awareness about how important UJA Federation is to the community," Goldhar explains.

But all that aside, he says, he's just happy to help out.

Campaign '98 puts premium on children

UJA Federation Campaign '98 Chairman Leo Goldhar and Vice-Chairs Glennie Lindenberg and David Engel are asking the community to increase their campaign support on behalf of children.

The three leaders have outlined several crucial needs, including financial assistance for disadvantaged children, overseas rescue of young Jews, primarily from the Former Soviet Union, and more programs to enhance Jewish identity.

An estimated 4,000 Jewish children are living below the poverty line in the Greater Toronto Area. Increased donations, according to Engel, will help UJA Federation improve the quality of life for children and their families who are burdened by insufficient income and its side effects. More money, he says, is required to support existing supplementary financial assistance provided by Jewish Family and Child Service, and additional subsidies for food, housing and summer camp experiences.

Some 15,000 young people will be leaving the Former Soviet Union this year.

This year 15,000 youngsters and teenagers from the Former Soviet Union will move to Israel, thanks to the UJA Federation-funded Jewish Agency. Every additional $325 to the UJA Federation campaign will pay for one flight and every increase of $250 will send a Jewish child to summer camp in the FSU, Lindenberg points out.

Funding for initiatives enhancing Jewish identity among local youth will go toward education subsidies, Israel Experience programs and synagogue outreach.

"UJA Federation can be the connection to Jewish identity so many young people are seeking," says Goldhar.

"Our kids are wondering if we are prepared to practice the Jewish values we are so proud to preach," Lindenberg adds.

Engel: still going strong

Although David Engel is entering his second year as Vice-Chair of UJA Federation's annual campaign, the highly energized businessman, family man and volunteer has hardly run out of steam.

Engel, an ex-Montrealer and graduate of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program, began his extremely active involvement with UJA Federation more than ten years ago. He has chaired UJA Federation's Marketing Division as well as the Young Leadership Network and rarely declines a request to help out.

In 1995, Engel helped to change the way campaigners relate to donors. Engel's innovative ideas included more comprehensive one-on-one campaign training and personalized thank you letters to donors.

David Engel

Last year Engel and his fellow Vice-Chair Michael Daren and Chairman David Goldstein helped to raise $35.5 million. In the 1998 campaign Engel hopes to attract younger people to UJA Federation's growing family.

Lindenberg leaps into Campaign

For years Glennie Lindenberg has been an important voice in Jewish Women's Federation. This year, her sights are set on a larger landscape as Vice-Chair of UJA Federation's Campaign '98.

Lindenberg, a lawyer in partnership with her husband Nathan, began her involvement with UJA Federation in the early 80's when she joined the Business and Professional Women's Network, becoming the chair two years later.

In 1994, Lindenberg was appointed President of Jewish Women's Federation.

Glennie Lindenberg

Lindenberg says she's always felt her Jewish identity is enhanced by her community involvement. "It's really a very big part of who I am."

CONVERSION LEGISLATION

IT'S TIME TO BUILD BRIDGES

UJA Federation is trying to encourage dialogue among segments of the community in the wake of religious conversion legislation, which has received first reading in the Knesset. The bill would legalize the status quo under which only Orthodox conversions performed in Israel are recognized. Those who convert outside the country would not be affected.

"We hope to develop respectful discussion and mutual understanding," said UJA Federation President Sandra Brown.

Sandra Brown

UJA Federaton has been meeting over the past few weeks with Orthodox, Conservative and Reform movement representatives. Brown has communicated her "dismay" with the conversion legislation and "distress" over the communal divisions it has caused.

"The Directors of UJA Federation feel the sense of alienation and disenfranchisement expressed by Reform and Conservative Jews," she said.

The UJA Federation Board of Directors recently endorsed a resolution passed by the Council of Jewish Federations, which urges the government of Israel to "abstain from amending legislation or passing any new legislation which would change the current situation regarding recognition of conversions."

Brown sees community unity as the most important priority on behalf of Jews in need. "Our communal partnership must be stronger than politics, the proponents of separation and the opponents of klal yisrael," she noted. "Now is the time to intensify our determination to assist every Jew at home and overseas who needs our help."

Rosenblatt brings love of Bible to Toronto

In the beginning, Naomi Rosenblatt studied the Book of Genesis to discover the hidden secrets of adulthood. Since then, her childhood curiosity has led to a lifelong passion for teaching Bible lessons to a growing number of followers from housewives to politicians to Wall Street executives and accomplished journalists.

Naomi Rosenblatt

Rosenblatt will be in Toronto next week as the guest speaker at an evening sponsored by Jewish Women's Federation and UJA Women's Campaign, Wednesday, June 4, 8:00 p.m., at Chapters book store, 110 Bloor Street West. The well known author will also be promoting the best-seller she co-authored with former student Joshua Horwitz Wrestling with Angels: What Genesis Teaches Us About Our Spiritual Identity, Sexuality and Personal Relationships.

Since its publication in hardcover in 1995, Wrestling With Angels, which examines the lives of the patriarchs and matriarchs depicted in Genesis and translates their experiences and identities into the modern world, has won Book of the Month Club and Jewish Book Club designations. Rosenblatt's success has also led to several television and radio appearances during the last two years on programs such as Bill Moyers' 10 part PBS mini series "Genesis - A Living Conversation" and NBC's Today Show.

A psychotherapist by training, Rosenblatt has spent the last twenty years running her own private practice from her Washington D.C. home and conducting weekly Bible study classes around her dining room table and in the Capitol Hill office of U.S. Senator Arlen Spector. The grandmother of three also instructs journalists such as Ted Koppel and New York Times columnist William Safire. Other high profile Rosenblatt disciples include Ohio State Senator Howard Metzenbaum, Lynda Robb, daughter of former U.S. President Lyndon Johnson, Marvin Kalb, Director of the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, and Nitza Elissar, wife of Israel's Ambassador to the United States.

"People are interested in studying and discussing the Book of Genesis for all kinds of reasons," says Rosenblatt. "But the common thread is the desire to understand where we all came from and the humanity we all share." Rosenblatt says there's no better guide to unravelling the mysteries of human nature. "Genesis is the DNA of Jewish identity."

Although she was born and raised in Haifa, Rosenblatt's parents — father from Scotland and mother from Winnipeg — taught their daughter English at an early age. After she served in the Israeli Navy, while still in her teens, she met her husband Peter, an American student whom she followed back to the U.S.

From the age of six, Rosenblatt was drawn to the Book of Genesis to learn about the adult world. "I was exposed to worldly matters without having to leave my neighbourhood." She says she continues to derive insight and spiritual nourishment from the life stories of Abraham, Sarah and Isaac.

"I identify most with Rebecca because of her tremendous courage and willingness to pay a heavy price for the sake of family unity and I empathize with King David's internal conflict over his country's borders."

For tickets at $20 per person for Rosenblatt's June 4 appearance, call (416) 635-2883 ext. 174.

RELIGIOUS STATUS IN ISRAEL

The following resolution was recently endorsed by the UJA Federation Board of Directors.

Whereas, the Council of Jewish Federations views, with the highest priority, the preservation of the unity of the Jewish people; and

Whereas, the centrality of Israel to all Jews is fundamental to our very Peoplehood; and

Whereas, the support of the Jewish people for the State of Israel and its identification with it are one of the most important strategic assets of the State of Israel; and

Whereas, freedom of religion and conscience are basic principles of the State of Israel; and

Whereas, the Law of Return is one of the basic laws of the State of Israel, as well as a fundamental aspect of Jewish peoplehood, and has immediate ramifications for the relations between Israel and the Diaspora;

The Council of Jewish Federations urges the Government of Israel and the Knesset:

To abstain from amending legislation, or passing any new legislation which would change the current situation regarding recognition of conversions.

Not to change any aspect of the Law of Return which is one of the pillars of Jewish identification with the State of Israel in each and every Jewish community around the world.

To adhere to the Covenant (Article 7) between the Government and the Jewish Agency regarding consultation with the Jewish Agency on legislation specifically affecting the functions of the Agency before such legislation is submitted to the Knesset.

We, the Board of Delegates assembled at this 65th General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations, meeting at a critical moment concerning this issue, urge the leaders of Israel not to underestimate the strength of feeling on this matter, and its detrimental effect on Jewish unity and Israel-Diaspora relations.

We direct the leadership of CJF to convey to the political leaders of Israel, in the most vigorous, immediate and continuing way possible, that they must not risk dividing the world Jewish community. Simultaneously, we affirm our continued total support for Israel, and for the Federation/UJA/UIA-Canada Campaigns, and call upon every Jewish organization and institution in North America to endorse this principle.

STEPPING FORWARD FOR THE COMMUNITY

After Vadim Dreyzin completed medical school at the University of Toronto, he decided to connect with the local Jewish community. One of the first steps he took was attending a UJA Federation program, Out in Front, run by the Young Leadership Cabinet, on behalf of young adults, 25-40, who want to become involved. The next session takes place on Thursday, June 5, 7:00 p.m., The Game Room, 449 Walmer Road.

The purpose of Out in Front is to introduce people to various volunteer opportunities and match them with an activity that interests them, says Co-Chair David Rashkovan. "We get many calls from people who want to connect with the community but they don't know how."

"We want volunteering to be fun for participants and beneficial for the community," adds Jacqueline Valmont, who also co-chairs Out in Front.

Tracy Waner

Tracy Waner, who emigrated from South Africa two years ago, agrees. She says she has developed a network of friends through her involvement with UJA Federation.

While Waner is still in the process of exploring volunteer options for herself, lawyer Sarit Goldman is moving full steam ahead.

Goldman, who grew up in the Toronto area, is now a Co-Chair of UJA Federation's Young Professionals Network. She recently helped to organize an evening at the Jewish Film Festival, followed by a reception for more than 150 people at a local restaurant.

These days, Goldman is looking into starting a free legal clinic for seniors, and she's also organizing a bus mission to some of UJA Federation's beneficiary agencies. "We want to get people who aren't involved and interest them in giving service to the community," she says.

THE GIFT OF LEARNING

Youth on two different continents will benefit from a learn-a-thon for high school students sponsored by UJA Federation and the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY).

Participants will be able to increase their Jewish knowledge while, at the same time, raising money so that UJA Federation can help young people from the Former Soviet Union make aliyah.

Open to Jewish high school students from all backgrounds, the learn-a-thon takes place Monday June 2, from 5 to 9 p.m. on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst Street.

The program features videos, food, speakers, discussion groups and prizes, such as a Walk for Israel T-shirt for anyone who raises $18.

Learn-a-thon Coordinator Shoshana Weinberg, who's been involved with NCSY since Grade 7, says UJA Federation asked NCSY to help run the project because the youth organization is very active in outreach to high school students. The goal of the learn-a-thon, she adds, is to increase the exposure of students to Judaism on behalf of a worthy cause.

For information on the learn-a-thon call Weinberg at 905-761-6279 ext. 66 or Marc Bookbinder at 416-631-5703.

Many of these NCSY advisors will be participating in an upcoming learn-a-thon, co-sponsored by UJA Federation.

Sometimes the Simplest Things are the Most Special.

Everyone has their own idea of what simple means. To us at The Simple Alternative it means good taste and common sense. Simplicity is one of the hallmarks of Jewish funeral tradition. Expensive caskets and elaborate services are not part of this tradition. And, as many of our families tell us: sometimes the simplest things are the most special.

Yaffa Eliach continues mission to gather images of shtetl life

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Yaffa Eliach in the Tower of Faces. She prefers "Tower of Life."

TORONTO — Yaffa Eliach has delved into the past like a pearl diver who scours the depths for hidden treasures. As a daughter and granddaughter of amateur photographers, she knows the power of the image. Thus, to drive home the impact the Holocaust had on a single Polish shtetl (hers), Eliach continues to unearth pictures of a shattered past — not to shock, but to enlighten.

The Tower of Faces is one of the more popular sights — if the term can be used — at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C, where, on a metal bridge, the viewer finds himself surrounded by faces: children, parents, grandparents, uncles, siblings. These were the Jews of Ejszyszki (Eishyshok in Yiddish, now part of Lithuania), where on a single day, Oct. 20, 1944, uniformed Poles barely out of their teens murdered Eliach's mother and baby brother.

Relatively atypical of the pogrom at Eishyshok was that it happened following the town's liberation — three months after the Nazis were driven out. The participants were not Germans but 150 Poles, half of them members of the Polish Home Army.

The town had been home to 3,500 Jews before the war. After liberation, about 30 or so returned and camped out in two homes. Among them were Eliach, then seven, her parents and two brothers. On that terrible day, the gang of thugs, accompanied by a neighbor, stormed the family house. Eliach had been hiding in a closet, watching through a crack as her mother held her infant brother Chaim in her arms, and, addressing the attackers by name, pleaded to be killed first so she would not have to witness her child's death. In reply, the young men fired nine bullets into the baby and then pumped another 15 into Eliach's mother. Eliach counted every round.

Now among the foremost Holocaust historians (some say the successor to Lucy Dawidowicz), Eliach is professor of Judaic Studies at Brooklyn College, and on something of a mission: to leave a legacy of every Jew from Eishyshok who was killed, before and after liberation. She's been digging for 18 years, ever since then U.S. president Jimmy Carter appointed her to his Holocaust Commission, and has traveled to six continents to buy, barter and even smuggle her precious photos.

To date, she's collected over 10,000 photographs, 1,500 of which adorn the Washington museum's Tower of Faces (she prefers calling it the Tower of Life). In all, she's culled photos of 98 percent of the Jewish population of Eishyshok, but for Eliach, this has been more than just dry research.

"I would never dedicate my time and life to Holocaust documentation, because it's a very painful subject," she told The CJN just before appearing at Beth Emeth Synagogue as a weekend scholar-in-residence. "The reason I'm doing this is I hope my teaching and research will have an impact on the future, so that this will never happen again."

For Eliach, these aren't mere pictures, but portraits of a dynamic daily life in a typical Polish town that dated back 900 years. One of the better known images is of a 4-year-old Eliach surrounded by chickens on the very day the Nazis marched into Ejszyszki.

Eliach has now teamed up with PBS for a documentary on the town and the Tower of Faces, which she hopes will promote coexistence — the kind that existed in Eishyshok, at least until the war.

"For the future of our survival," she says, "it's very important to examine the events, to understand them, but for positive reasons. Not for hate. Not for distrust. And not to blame one another, but to assure the future."

Like Elie Wiesel, to whom she's also been compared, Eliach is involved in promoting tolerance, because, as she puts it, "Who knows who will be the 'Jews' of the next holocaust? You can always isolate a group of people; the Holocaust was a blueprint."

Growth in Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The Jewish community in this area increased by 25 percent between 1971 and 1991, up from 4,115 people in 1971 to 5,145 in 1991, according to a recently released study by McGill University's Consortium for Ethnicity and Strategic Social Planning.

The demographic study by James Torczyner and Shari Brotman was carried out in conjunction with the Council of Jewish Federations-Canada, Hamilton-Wentworth Jewish Federation and Statistics Canada. It covered the 10 federated communities of Canada: Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton, London, Windsor, Winnipeg, Calgary, Edmonton and Vancouver.

The definition of a Jew was based on the Canadian census as being "someone who identifies him/herself as being 'Jewish by religion,' or 'Jewish by religion and ethnic origin' or 'Jewish by ethnic origin with no religion.' "

Of the Jews in Hamilton, 86.6 percent said they identified with the Jewish religion, a slightly lower rate than the Canadian average, while 13.4 percent said they were Jewish by ethnic origin but had no religion.

While the Hamilton community's 25 percent growth is described as "moderate and steady" and "more substantial" than the national Jewish rate, it nevertheless "fell well below" the national growth rate of other mid-sized (between 5,000 and 20,000) communities.

The single most important factor in the increase in Hamilton's Jewish population is "the continued, steady increase in the number of Jewish children." The 1981 census figures gave the number of Jewish children under 10 as 650; by 1991, that number had risen to 1,010, an increase of 55 percent.

The age structure of the Hamilton community shows a 7.8 percent drop in the 15- to 34-year-old population, while 35- to 44-year-olds grew by five percent.

The percentage of Jewish seniors increased by nine percent since 1981, with an increase in every age group except that between 70 and 74, which showed a marginal decrease.

The study also found that 75 percent of Hamilton's Jews live in traditional husband-wife families and while over the past 10 years there has been a 3.9 percent increase in husband-wife families, and a four percent drop in single parent families, the national rate of husband-wife families has declined by four percent, while single parent families have increased by 1.8 percent.

Hamilton Jewry's intermarriage rate, however, was 16.3 percent, slightly higher than the national average of 14.8 percent.

The study further shows that Hamilton Jewry has attained higher levels of education and income and has more professionals than the Hamilton population as a whole.

At the same time, one out of seven Hamilton Jews (14.2 percent), mostly elderly, lives below or near the poverty line, a rate slightly lower than the national 15.4 percent average.

While the study suggests that the Jewish community's future appears promising, its recommendations include strengthening Jewish identification, creating opportunities for Jewish singles and young families and reaching out to unaffiliated Jews.

Student seminar held

By BARBARA SIVAK
Special to The CJN

WATERLOO — The Waterloo County Holocaust Education Committee recently held its eighth annual student seminar at Wilfrid Laurier University, drawing 650 students from high schools in the region and vicinity.

This year's seminar focused on the role of investigative reporting in exposing hate groups in and around the community. The first part of the program was a presentation by two award-winning investigative reporters from The Hamilton Spectator.

Casey Korstanje and Andrew Dreschel spent three months in 1995 investigating the Romanian Iron Guard, and found it was using the Hamilton area as a secret base.

They reported that the Iron Guard hides behind Hamilton's Romanian Cultural Association and uses its private campground in Flamborough as a meeting and recruitment centre.

Rev. Oscar Cole Arnall, a professor at Wilfrid Laurier University, discussed the role Christianity has played over the years in fueling anti-Semitism.

Several survivors from the community and from Toronto described their experiences in the Holocaust and students had the opportunity to talk with them.

This fall, the committee is planning its annual teacher's seminar on the Holocaust, whose purpose is to provide teachers with resource material to facilitate the teaching of the Holocaust.

Hillel plays major role in Seneca student's life

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Tammy Nisinov

TORONTO — When Tammy Nisinov entered Seneca College in 1995, she didn't know Hillel existed. That changed in January 1996. Leaving class one day, she spotted a Hillel sign, leading her to what was to become an intense involvement in steering the Jewish student organization in new directions.

As president of Seneca Hillel for the past year, Nisinov's efforts helped raise its on-campus profile and earned her a Seneca Student Federation award, the top honor given by Seneca's student government to an on-campus club for outstanding contribution to student life.

A year and a half ago, her curiosity piqued by the Hillel sign and Israeli music she heard in the background, Nisinov became involved in a lengthy, animated discussion with a small group of Hillel students and their staff program coordinator Tami Sitcoff.

"I had so many ideas," enthused Nisinov, 21, during a recent interview at her home. "Why don't we do something to bring in more members?" she suggested.

The Israeli-born accounting and finance student, who moved to Toronto nine years ago, also wondered about the dearth of Israeli members and proceeded to brainstorm solutions geared to attracting more students.

When she became president last fall, she was able to put some of her ideas into action.

Hillel's kickoff event, a Sukkah open to all Seneca students, got the year off to a successful start. "It was the best," said Nisinov, her eyes widening with zeal and her words picking up speed as she described other recent Hillel events.

Holocaust survivor Judy Cohen spoke at one event. "Her story touched everybody's heart," said Nisinov, adding with pride, "You should have seen that room — it was full of people."

Even more spectacular in terms of attendance was the January city-wide dance organized by Seneca Hillel as a fundraiser for Mazon Canada. Members put "all our heart and soul" into organizing the event; six hundred students turned out for it.

A women's discussion group and Jewish-themed social outings rounded out the schedule.

Surprisingly, Nisinov hasn't been involved in any other organizations — although she says that as a small child her dream was to be "president of the world." During her years at Newtonbrook Secondary School, she never found a group that sparked her enthusiasm the way Hillel has.

"I said to myself, 'There's something in it.' "

Last summer she was one of 11 local students to participate in Hillel's international leadership conference held in Pennsylvania.

Although she was confident about her leadership ability, attracting Israeli students to Hillel was an uphill battle. She persisted in outreach efforts, trying to combat stereotypes of Canadian Jews among Israeli students. When half a dozen Israelis joined Hillel in the second semester, Nisinov was "so happy."

Liaising with other campus clubs was another satisfying achievement for Nisinov this past year. "I don't think it's right to keep to yourself," she said.

Nisinov made a point of attending meetings with other club executives and of encouraging her own executives to join her. Hillel's booth at Seneca's campus-wide international day was another coup, with falafel samples and a Jewish wedding display, complete with chuppah.

As far as attracting more members, the numbers on Hillel's mailing list don't tell the whole story, Nisinov explained. The current list has 210 names, down from a woefully obsolete 270 last summer. "We're building it up," she said confidently.

Election '97

One Jewish candidate running in Hamilton area

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — This area's sole Jewish candidate running for election on June 2 is Allan Lonn, a lawyer and the Reform party's nominee in Wentworth-Burlington.

A large riding bordering on the city's western outskirts, Wentworth-Burlington includes Ancaster, where in recent years, close to 200 Jewish families have settled, as well as Dundas, which, together with neighboring Hamilton-West, has the largest number of the area's 5,100 Jews.

Lonn hopes to defeat Liberal incumbent John Bryden.

Other candidates in the riding are the Progressive Conservative's Jerry Aggus, also a lawyer, and newcomer Jessica Brennan for the New Democratic Party, known for her volunteer work with local charitable organizations.

Charitable groups

In Hamilton West, five candidates are vying for the seat held by Liberal MP Stan Keyes. Andrea Howarth, co-chair of the Hamilton social action committee and recently named one of six winners of the Hamilton Woman of the Year award, is running for the NDP. The Reform party has Ken Griffith, 32, an advertising executive, while the Tory hopeful is lawyer John Findlay, 43.

Also running here are Brian Rickard for the Natural Law party, and Wendell Fields for the Marxist-Leninists.

The Jewish population of Hamilton East has increased in recent years with the move of many retirees into downtown condominiums. This is the riding of deputy prime minister Sheila Copps. Running against her are insurance company inspector Kevin Barber for Reform; Wayne Morriston, a retired Bell Telephone employee and chair of the Hamilton District Labor Council for the NDP; accountant Michael Hilson for the Conservatives; and Rolf Gerstenberger, Marxist-Leninist.

Another Liberal stronghold is Hamilton Mountain, with a handful of Jews spread over a large area. Here, MP Beth Phinney is being opposed by Conservative John Smith, a former minister in the provincial Tory government; graduate student Chris Charleton for the NDP; lawyer Richard Gaasenbeek, Reform; Iqbal Sumbal, Marxist-Leninist and Christopher Patty, Canada Action Party.

Stoney Creek

Stoney Creek is a riding with just a small number of Jews. The candidates here are incumbent Tony Valeri, Liberal; Tory Angie Tomasic, a bank manager who ran against Copps in last summer's by-election; businessman Clay Downes, Reform; lawyer Peter Cassidy, NDP; Cynthia Marchand, Natural Law party and Angela Braun, Christian Heritage party.

In Burlington, the approximately 200 Jewish families are spread throughout this sprawling bedroom community. The incumbent here is Paddy Torsney, Liberal, a former public relations consultant. He's opposed by Tory Mike Kuegle, a lawyer; Jim Hough, NDP, an electronics technician and labor activist; Terry Lamping, Reform, formerly in the insurance business and now with PetroCan; and Anne Marsden, a social activist, Canada Action Party.

Candidates focus on jobs, health

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

VAUGHAN — Jobs, health care and gun control are concerns candidates in Thornhill riding say they have encountered on the campaign trail.

Thornhill

The riding was created during the most recent redistribution from parts of York North, represented by Liberal Maurizio Bevilacqua, and Markham, held by independent Jag Bhaduria.

It's estimated that Thornhill is at least one-quarter Jewish.

A good deal of attention has been focused on the riding, due to the parachuting of former Ontario health minister Elinor Caplan as the Liberal candidate, over the strident objections of several local residents who had stood for nomination.

Caplan told The CJN she believes the furor has pretty much died down. People realize, she said, that her appointment "sends a strong message to the Jewish community" on how significantly Prime Minister Jean Chretien views the riding.

It is also an opportunity, she said, for there to be a Jewish MP from the Greater Toronto area.

People are more concerned, she said, about good jobs, and "those things that stem from a strong economy and a compassionate government."

She has also encountered concerns about keeping the community safe, with many supporting gun control.

Lawyer Bill Fisch, the Conservative candidate, has been a councillor in Thornhill's Ward 7, and since 1994, a regional councillor for Markham. He said he's "the only local candidate who has been actively involved in the community."

The message he's hearing is "very strong and clear. People are worried about jobs, the economy, tax relief, health care and education."

While the campaign started slowly because of the floods in Manitoba and interest in the Bre-X mines, "things are really picking up. [Leader Jean] Charest has done very well in the debates."

NDP candidate Helen Breslauer, an educational consultant, also sees concerns in jobs, health care and education. People are "bruised" when it comes to politicians, she said, who "promise lots, but don't seem to deliver what is promised."

She denounced federal cuts to transfer payments, which, she said, have damaged post secondary education to the extent that universities are looking for corporate money, "which comes with strings."

Dentist Aurel David, the Reform party's hopeful, said he decided to run because he supports the party platform, particularly that all provinces should be treated equally, and that there be less government and lower taxes.

The family should be strengthened, he believes, by advocating tax breaks, an increased allowance for those who choose to stay home with their children, and a $5,000 tax credit for each child.

Thornhill residents want their community to be free of crime, he said, and want the Young Offenders' Act revised. "The system puts the criminal before the victims," he charged.

Accountability is a key issue for independent candidates Rick Levine and Sid Soban, who both say that constituents can only benefit from representatives who are concerned only for their welfare and are not obligated to follow a party line.

Soban, a small businessman, supports the restoration and strengthening of social services, health care and education; a more equitable tax system; and taking steps to create new jobs, like increasing tax credits to small businesses in direct proportion to an increase in their work force, and encouraging banks to provide lower interest loans for companies making investments that will create permanent jobs.

Levine, a band leader and entertainment promoter, wants politicians to take responsibility for "broken promises, like removing the GST, and job creation."

All candidates agree the riding's residents are concerned about national unity.

Also running in the riding are independent Shel Bergson and Linda Martin for the Natural Law party.

Manning's bid for seat draws national attention

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Calgary Southwest is one of those ridings that will be watched with interest across the country, and it also happens to have the largest concentration of Jewish voters in the city.

Calgary Southwest

The bulk of the city's Jewish population resides in Calgary Southwest and day schools, synagogues and the Calgary Jewish Centre lie within its boundaries.

The riding is of national interest because the incumbent MP is Reform party leader Preston Manning. Calgary Southwest is where Manning entered national politics, trouncing Conservative cabinet minister Bobbie Sparrow in the last election.

Manning faces a full slate of challengers in the June 2 election, six in all, including representatives of the major parties and two Jewish contenders.

Running for the Conservatives is former Reformer Jan Brown, whose much-publicized break with Reform in 1996 made her nearly a household name. Brown's resignation came after she refused to vote with the party against gay rights legislation.

switched ridings as well as parties to take on her former leader in Calgary Southwest.

Brown's presence in the campaign has turned the race into something of a soap opera, with the media keeping an eye on her relationship with Manning. While all the candidates say they've found voters to be concerned about jobs, economic issues, health care and national unity, the event which was most prominently covered in Calgary newspapers so far is Brown's surprise appearance at a breakfast hosted by Manning.

With the Tory vote split between Manning and Brown, some political observers believe the field is open to a victory for Liberal candidate Paul Drager.

A lawyer and former diplomat, Drager's area of expertise is international trade. As a diplomat, he served in Moscow and the Netherlands, and for the past eight years, has headed up the international trade section of a major law firm in Calgary.

Drager's main challenge is to overcome the anti-Liberal sentiment in Alberta, which dates from the infamous National Energy Policy.

Also hoping to make a run up the middle in this election is New Democratic Party candidate Mara Vogel. A native Calgarian and an involved member of the Jewish community, Vogel has degrees in psychology and law, and is a small business owner. Her campaign centres around concerns for social justice and tzedakah.

Other contenders in Calgary Southwest are Sol Candel, running for the environmentalist Green party; Larry Heather, representing the Christian Heritage party, a pro-life group which is running four candidates in Alberta; and Richard Shelford of the Natural Law party.

Other ridings to watch here are Calgary Centre and Calgary West. Both were held by prominent Reformers (Jim Silye and Stephen Harper) who have retired from politics. In both ridings, relatively unknown Reformers are being challenged by high-profile city councillors running for the Liberals.

Job loss a major concern in Eastern Canada

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — As the federal election campaign enters its last days, Atlantic Canadians are worried.

They are concerned about the increasing loss of jobs, and rising unemployment figures. They wonder about Canadian unity. But most of all, they think about the apathy toward this election campaign that has left most people wondering if it will have an effect on Canadians at all.

There are no Jewish candidates in the region's 33 ridings. There are also very few issues that specifically concern Jewish voters, except for the issue of Nazi war criminals in Canada.

"The war crimes issue makes it hard to vote Liberal," says Claire Salama, of St. John's, Nfld., a member-at-large of the Atlantic Jewish Council's (AJC) board of directors. "They've been dragging their behinds for so long and don't seem to be making any progress."

She says national unity is also a concern for Newfoundlanders.

For Jewish Newfoundlanders, Montreal is an important city," Salama says. "Many Newfoundlanders hail from Montreal and they're disappointed what they find when they visit there. And many Newfoundlanders are in retail and find it quite different than years ago when they go there for business. When relatives from Quebec visit here, they also have grim stories."

Jon Goldberg, executive director of the AJC, says Canadian Jewish Congress and the Canada-Israel Committee have asked regional offices to monitor candidates for comments on Israel, the peace process and the status of Jerusalem and he has made regional representatives aware of that.

"We've had no negative reports on candidates so far but I think Israeli issues are low on their campaign platforms. They're answering constituents' questions about jobs, unemployment, transfer payments, health care and other issues more germane to Canada."

He says many candidates appeared at Yom Hashoah ceremonies in Halifax, Saint John and St. John's, "an indication of their support for the Jewish communities. But local candidates aren't concerned with Jewish issues specifically."

In New Brunswick, the judicial system that allows the publication and distribution of hate literature is an issue that concerns the Jewish population, says Ivan Levine, a past chair of the AJC.

"Otherwise the issues are jobs, unemployment, highways and unity. New Brunswick has about 50 percent French population. Quebec separation would affect us more than other provinces."

MONTREAL — Liberal Sheila Finestone garnered 85 percent of the vote in the 1993 election, but the candidates are not acting like the outcome of this election is a foregone conclusion.

Mount Royal

The campaign has been enlivened by the presence of an independent, anti-separatist activist Howard Galganov, whose main plank is opposition to the distinct society clause, and of Conservative Carolyn Steinman, a well-known Jewish community professional and lay leader, whose theme is that Jean Charest is the only leader who can save the country.

Determined not to be overlooked are the NDP's Adam Giambrone, an articulate 20-year-old student, and Jacques Thibaudeau, 68, a retired Radio-Canada producer, who says he using his candidacy to frankly communicate to anglophones why many francophones support sovereignty.

Mount Royal is home to about 40,000 Jews.

Finestone, 70, who is seeking her fourth term, admits there's a lot of "disgruntlement" with Chrétien's handling of the national unity issue in the riding.

She believes the government's success in reducing the deficit will ensure Canada's economic health and, when things are going well, Quebecers will be less interested in separation.

A Supreme Court opinion on the legality of separation will clarify the role Ottawa should play in any future referendum, she said.

Constitutional recognition of Quebec's distinctness will have little impact, she feels. "It will only reaffirm what the Supreme Court has already been doing — taking the particular nature of Quebec into consideration in its decisions."

She heartily supports the municipal "staying Canadian" resolutions, including the first ones passed in Cote St. Luc and Hampstead, which call for these cities to hold their own referendum on partition, if Quebec says yes to separation.

Steinman, 59, local director of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, says "never in my wildest dreams did I imagine that one day I would run for public office." The reason, she says, is fear for Canada's break-up.

"Jean Chrétien let the country down during the last referendum. He told Canadians there was nothing to worry about...Jean Charest fought for Canada," she said.

Steinman, whose father was Russian-born, has been appealing to the riding's many ethnic groups with patriotic talk about how people of all backgrounds call themselves Canadian. At her nomination, she shared the stage with three Russian immigrant friends who had just received citizenship.

"I don't feel like a sacrificial lamb," she said (the Tories came third in '93). She's hoping Charest's soaring personal popularity will translate into votes for her. If elected, she's been promised a position in his shadow cabinet.

Both Steinman and Galganov shy away from criticizing Finestone personally. Steinman says she has a lot of respect for her, and Galganov, who lives in St. Lazare, admits he doesn't know her.

Galganov, 47, who co-owns an advertising company, says distinct society would "institutionalize varying levels of equality among citizens" by giving Quebec special powers.

He does not call himself a partitionist, but supports the municipal unity resolutions. "In the event of a unilateral declaration of independence, there will be no power in Quebec which will be capable of stopping federalist areas from remaining Canadian.

"In the final analysis, if the separatist nightmare scenario comes to pass, and if the barricades are ever erected, I will be standing proudly with the Canadians."

Giambrone has prepared a platform that stresses fair taxation, strengthening the Canada and Quebec pension plans, and the protection of social programs.

Thibaudeau has to be philosophical about running for the Bloc in Mount Royal, one of the most federalist ridings.

"I'm only running for one reason: to meet people, to explain sovereignty, that it is nothing to be afraid of and that sovereigntists are not against anybody," he said. "But I'm sure I won't convert anybody. I just want them to understand our point of view."

On the issue of war criminals, Finestone, Steinman and Galganov expressed dissatisfaction with the government's progress.

Finestone insisted there's not a lack of political will, but rather the stringency of our justice system, that has delayed action. "The process has to be accepted if you believe in the rule of law and the equal application of the law."

Steinman said Charest is well-informed on the issue and understands how Jews feel. "What a Conservative government would do exactly, I can't say, but Charest would do a heckuva lot more than the Liberals."

Election '97

Federalist riding a Liberal stronghold

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Westmount-Ville-Marie riding is one of the safest Liberal strongholds in Quebec, and Liberal incumbent Lucienne Robillard will likely lose little sleep worrying over the outcome on the eve of the June 2 vote.

Westmount-Ville-Marie

The riding stretches from the Decarie autoroute in NDG at its western edge to St. Lawrence Boulevard in the east, and encompasses tony Westmount, downtown Montreal to the northern edge of Mount Royal, as well as Little Burgundy in the south.

The almost monolithically federalist anglophones and allophones outnumber the francophones in the significantly federalist constituency by a 2-1 ratio, and the riding includes an estimated 8,000 Jews (out of about 76,000 riding voters).

For Robillard — who is being challenged by Progressive Conservative (PC) candidate Thomas Davis, Bernard Guité of the Bloc Québécois (BC), and Chris Carter for the New Democrats (NDP) — the issues are jobs and the economy, national unity and medicare, in that order.

But they are all inextricably linked, Robillard suggested in a CJN interview.

Out on the hustings, Robillard, who is also immigration minister, carried the banner for the federalist forces in Quebec before the October 1995 referendum and has sensed the pervasive anxiety over Quebec separating among her constituents.

She has sought to reassure voters that the Liberals do indeed have a strategy. It's two-pronged: build jobs and the economy while setting the rules for the next referendum before the Supreme Court.

"I'm telling you it's our most important commitment to assure the national unity of our country," said Robillard, who, although not Jewish, lived in Israel for several years and continues to impress unsuspecting Jewish audiences with her mastery of Hebrew.

"It's the role of the prime minister to have a plan of action. The rules must be clear. But the plan is not well-known to the people and that's what I'm doing."

Not so, says PC challenger Thomas Davis, a lawyer who worked for the referendum No committee and also lobbied for the doomed Charlottetown Accord.

Davis accuses Robillard not only of being an absentee MP in terms of her constituents (unlike Davis, she does not live in the riding), but of not being there in general before the province came within a whisker of separating.

"People feel there was a lack of strategy," says Davis, who supports PC leader Jean Charest's "Plan A" approach to keeping Canada together. "He is the best person to lead us to a unified country."

Although acknowledging that he has an uphill climb in the riding, Davis says usually Liberal-bent Westmount voters are letting him know they think it's time for a change.

That includes the Jewish community, who vote overwhelmingly Liberal.

In contact with Jewish voters, "I got the same sense of frustration over the lack of leadership on the national unity issue," says Davis. "They appear to be ready to make a change."

NDP candidate Chris Carter, only 24 and a past president of the McGill Student Society, sees jobs as the "central issue" in the election campaign.

But his focus is also on national unity and what he sees as the Liberal abandonment of social programs and Canadian institutions.

"You don't create unity by attacking institutions central to the Canadian identity," he said. "The Liberals have betrayed a trust."

Carter's approach to Quebec is inclusive. Recognize Quebec as a distinct society, but create a "sense of attachment" with the rest of the country by preserving the things that define Canada, such as social programs and access to health care.

BQ candidate Bernard Guité is under no illusion about winning.

But because separation, at least in his view, is inevitable, he has another goal: to create an "honest" dialogue with minority group federalists, who are equal Quebecers.

"We need a little more honesty and a little less [Howard] Galganov," said Guité, referring to the "angry anglo" activist.

While all the non-Liberal candidates voiced the need to do more on the war crimes issue, Robillard said she has met with Jewish community officials and expressed the Liberal government's "very large commitment" to bringing war criminals to justice.

Robillard can not deport anybody until a case is adjudicated before the courts.

There are 10 such cases pending and "it will be important to win the first one," she said.

"I know the Jewish community is very anxious to see results."

Stakes high as Canadian political sands shift for Quebec. Manning has played this card again and again, attempting to reach out to those who want to get tough with Quebec, who want to take out the tire irons and show Quebec that English Canada means business.

But this is a dangerous game for both Manning and the country. Manning may lose as many votes as he gains, especially if he begins to appear to be too anti-Quebec, too strident, too divisive. His tough talk could also produce a backlash in Quebec.

Manning's other major problem is that Tory Leader Jean Charest has emerged as the political star of election '97. He is a compelling and often fire-in-the-belly speaker and he clearly won both the English and French language debates. And although he still carries the heavy baggage of the Mulroney legacy, he is likely to resurrect the Conservatives from the ashes of their near obliteration in 1993.

Charest and Manning divide the political territory on the political right in a way that also divides up the country. The Tories are strong in Atlantic Canada and in Quebec, Reform dominates the west. The battleground between them will be Ontario.

But in Ontario the two right-wing parties are likely to split the vote, guaranteeing a Liberal victory.

While Charest is likely to be a major force in Canadian politics for some time to come because he is likely to exceed the expectations set for him by the media (and the media's expectations are always the critical high jump bar over which politicians have to jump), the same may not be true of Manning. If Reform fails to make a breakthrough in Ontario in this election, then Manning's leadership is to bound to be called into question. There are those who are already sharpening their knives.

While NDP leader Alexa McDonough has proved herself a feisty and tough campaigner, the New Democrats are unlikely to regain the strength they had prior to the 1993 election. Look for a strong showing in Saskatchewan, however.

The other great regional party is the Bloc Québécois. The Bloc's campaign sputtered and stalled for most of the election. Bloc leader Gilles Duceppe, a cold and listless speaker, was pushed aside in the midst of the campaign as separatists launched a major effort to staunch what appeared to be a serious of collapse of support.

The intervention of Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard has added still more fuel to the fire on the national unity issue. His firebrand style has raised the temperature considerably. Bouchard is arguing that a strong showing by the Bloc is essential if separatists want to win the next referendum. In doing so, he is putting his prestige and that of their movement on the line. He has made the election into a kind of mini-referendum.

A loss of even a few seats could be seen as a defeat for the sovereigntist cause and a blow to Bouchard's image as a political savior.

An election is always a time when a country has a chance to look into the mirror and see its own reflection. Citizens have a chance to see the strengths and the weaknesses of their society, its successes as well as its failures.

This will be a more important election than most of our elections have been. The stakes are high as the sands of Canadian politics continue to shift.

Teacher stepping down

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Gord Meslin loves his retirement but he does not want to give up his first love, teaching.

After 33 years as a history and geography teacher, department head and principal with the North York Board of Education, Meslin has retired, but not completely. He believes it's important to have some participation in the field of education.

"Retirement is happening younger and younger all the time and you must be prepared mentally and emotionally for an active retirement," says Meslin, 56. "I believe that retirement becomes the best years of your life."

He gained his love of teaching from his father, Jim Meslin, who was a Yiddish/Hebrew teacher in the 1930s and '40s in Windsor, Hamilton and Toronto. His father would occasionally take his young son with him and Meslin says he was awed by his father's passion for teaching.

He decided to enter the teaching profession when he was in Grade 12 at Downsview Collegiate Institute.

After he graduated from the University of Toronto's Faculty of Education, Meslin taught at Sir Sandford Fleming Secondary School, Georges Vanier Secondary School, York Mills Collegiate Institute and other North York schools, as well as at Ner Israel Yeshiva. He was principal in North York's summer and night school programs.

Interested in Holocaust education, he was hired to teach the subject at Holy Blossom Temple for three months and remained for three years. In the early 1980s, when Holocaust studies were introduced into North York schools, Meslin worked in the program and with the Holocaust education committee of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Meslin's latest project is with Cambridge International College, where he is principal of the summer school. Government cutbacks by all school boards, he says, have affected night and summer schools.

Shabbat street closing passes uneventfully

By ELLI WOHLGELERNTER
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The long-awaited Shabbat closing of Jerusalem's Rehov Bar Ilan went off without incident, with the street closed seven ½ hours during prayer hours and open to traffic the rest of the time.

But contrary to what secular residents of the neighborhood were told, the permits issued by the Transport Ministry explicitly state that they are not allowed to travel on Bar Ilan during the closed hours.

"You can't drive into Bar Ilan during prayer hours even with the permit — it's closed for everyone. The police do not allow any of the secular residents to go through," said Aliza Avinezer, one of the original petitioners to the High Court of Justice in the case.

Avinezer, who lives at the western end of Bar Ilan where the street's name changes to Yirmiyahu, said she still has to walk 300 to 400 metres to her house from where she can park.

During prayer hours when the road is closed, Avinezer said, "Bar Ilan is like a promenade, with people walking freely in the road like in Mea She'arim and Geula — and that's what they wanted!"

Police said late Saturday a few hundred Haredim stood on the sidewalk at the intersection of Bar Ilan and Shmuel Hanavi and screamed "Shabbes, Shabbes" at passing cars, but did not throw stones or garbage as at previous demonstrations.

"They are clever, because they know that if they make trouble, the road will be opened again," said Avinezer. "But it's only the beginning.

They will close the road for all of Shabbat — it's only a matter of time."

Municipal strikes halted

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Tel Aviv District Labor Court has issued restraining orders preventing strike action by 14 municipalities, including Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, and Haifa.

Histadrut campaign head Leon Moros said there will be no industrial action in the towns where restraining orders were served. The Histadrut said it intends appealing the decision to the National Labor Court, and announced that all the other 250 local authorities will strike all services, including education, special education and kindergartens.

The Education Ministry said it is determined to keep schools and kindergartens open. All administrators and teachers employed by the Education Ministry worked on Sunday, Director-General Benzion Dell said.

A meeting between the Union of Local Authorities (ULA) and Prime Minister's Office director-general Avigdor Lieberman failed to produce a compromise agreement.

Correction

The omission of a word in the "Message from Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu" on Israel's 49th Independence Day (May 22), inadvertently changed the meaning.

In reference to the proposed conversion law, the message should have been that "the bill intends to do no more than turn current practice in Israel into law, and...it ensures continued recognition by Israel of Reform and Conservative conversions performed abroad."

The CJN regrets the error.

Time to free Pollard: A-G

By BATSHEVA TSUR
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The time has come for Jonathan Pollard, serving a life sentence in the United States for spying for Israel, to be released, Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein said last Sunday.

"I think it is time to release him. He has already been in prison for 12 years," Rubinstein said in an interview with Halishka, the journal of the Jerusalem branch of the Israel Bar Association. "It is a very long time, especially in view of the fact that he spent some of this time in solitary confinement."

Rubinstein, who was minister at the Israeli Embassy and was in the building when Jonathan and Anne Pollard requested asylum in November 1983, said the world had changed a great deal since then.

"The American intelligence community should view this issue in that light," he said, noting that President Bill Clinton accepted their view.

"The feeling is that he received a very harsh sentence. Members of the American judicial system have spoken of shorter sentences," Rubinstein added.

Water, water everywhere...

Cabinet approves supply plan for Jordan

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The cabinet recently approved a plan to supply Jordan with 50 million cubic metres of water over the next three years, as part of Israel's commitment under the peace treaty with Amman.

The agreement, which has already received Jordan's approval, will pave the way for intensified negotiations on a range of joint infrastructure projects, National Infrastructure said Ministry spokesperson Ra'anan Gissin.

Water Commissioner Meir Ben-Meir met with his counterpart in Amman to conclude the agreement for the transfer, the second of its kind under the treaty. The water is to come from salt water currently used by kibbutzim in the Beit She'an area for fish farms.

However, it will take some three years to construct and prepare the required desalination plant on site. In the meantime, Ben-Meir has offered the Jordanians 25 million cubic metres of drinking water over the next three years from other sources, while preparations for desalination go ahead.

The first of these transfers is expected to take place by next week, according to Gissin. They will be used in the Amman area, where there is currently a water shortage, with faucets often running dry.

The Beit She'an project will cost an estimated NIS 500 million. In the peace treaty there is no mention of who will pay for the operation, but during his recent visit to Amman, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu offered to pay half the bill.

It is anticipated, according to Gissin, that the remainder will come from U.S. loan guarantees and from the World Bank. Negotiations on the third and final transfer of 50 million cubic metres have already begun, with water likely to be taken from the Jordan and Yarmuk rivers before they enter the Dead Sea. This project will in all likelihood be funded by foreign investors, led by Japanese companies, according to Gissin.

Sharon wants Israel to control West Bank sources

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — A hard line member of the Israeli government has proposed that Israel declare its sovereignty over large portions of the West Bank in order to ensure control over water sources.

National Infrastructure Minister Ariel Sharon raised the proposal at a meeting of senior ministers on the future of Israeli water sources, according to the Israeli daily Ha'aretz.

Implementation of the plan would require that Israel significantly reduce the amount of land it eventually transfers to the Palestinian Authority, Ha'aretz reported.

Sharon proposed that in return, Israel would triple its water supply to Palestinian towns. The Palestinians would also be obliged to build purification systems for waste water and sewage in order to prevent the contamination of water sources.

The water issue has become a source of friction between Israel and the United States because Sharon's ministry has refused to fulfil an understanding reached with the former Labor government of Yitzhak Rabin, Ha'aretz reported.

That understanding provided that the United States would allocate $46 million for an American company to drill three wells for Palestinians in the West Bank.

U.S. officials said Israel had approved two of the wells, but without authorization of the third, the work could not begin.

Sharon has demanded that the Palestinians first provide a plan for sewage disposal in the area.

MK 'uprising' threatened

– to stand firm on Jerusalem," said MK Shaul Yahalom of the National Religious Party. "On this issue there is the broadest consensus of all and if the government slides here, then there is no telling where it could take us next.

"We will be very vigilant and will not buy any cover story masking a halt to Har Choma construction. Even a 24-hour stoppage would not be undone for 24 months thereafter. There must be no yielding here. Our message to Netanyahu is clear: If you retreat, you are out of office."

The Week in Israel

May 19

• Israeli forces thwarted an attempted attack on a navy patrol north of Rosh Hanikra on the Lebanese border. According to reports, an Islamic militant was killed after he ignored orders to stop. The Amal organization in Lebanon claimed responsibility.

• A group of secular Israelis of Sephardi background have established a new social political movement. The founders said they acted because they felt the Shas Party does not represent their social or political outlook.

May 20

• Israeli and Palestinian negotiators met secretly overnight, but failed to make any progress in attempts to renew negotiations.

• Israel's ambassador to Jordan, Oded Eran, reversed his decision of last week to resign.

• Through special satellite hookup, parliamentarians from Israel, Britain and Germany marked Ron Arad's 39th birthday by appealing for his release.

May 21

• An Israeli soldier was seriously wounded by a roadside explosion planted by Hezbollah in the security zone in Lebanon.

• A government study concluded that Israeli men continue to earn significantly more than their female counterparts. The study said that in the public sector, wages differed by as much as 61 percent.

May 22

• Israeli media reported that Israel's President Ezer Weizman will meet with Egyptian president Hosni Mubarak, but an Egyptian official denied a meeting will take place anytime soon.

May 26

• Israeli-Arab MKs and Palestinian Authority officials helped battling Muslim and Christian clans in Lower Galilee to reach a peace agreement. It is hoped that the intervention of the two groups of officials will put an end to the month-long fighting that has left one Christian dead and at least four Muslims injured, two seriously. A police officer was also injured.

Labor fractured as primary beckons

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel's Labor party is heading into its leadership primary on June 3 in a fractured state.

The party, which lost last year's general election by a margin of less than one percentage point, is a house divided on the eve of one of the defining moments in its history.

The candidate who replaces current leader Shimon Peres will not only lead the party into the next scheduled election in 2000 but into the 21st century.

Four members of the Knesset are vying to succeed Peres — Ehud Barak, the former chief of staff who served as foreign minister in the last Labor government; Yossi Beilin, the former deputy foreign minister and one of the architects of the Oslo peace process; Ephraim Sneh, an ex-general and onetime minister of health; and Shlomo Ben-Ami, an academic who was Israel's ambassador to Spain.

The leading contender is doubtless Barak, who compares himself to his late mentor, Yitzhak Rabin. The darkest darkhorse is Ben-Ami, who has rejected proposals by Barak, Beilin and Sneh to remove himself from the contest in exchange for a plum position.

Regardless of the outcome, it is already clear that one of the first tasks of the victor, a herculean one in itself, will be to achieve a measure of unity. As a result of the maneuvering and the mudslinging so far, gaping holes have sprung up in the party, leaving it divided and rather weak. If parallels are needed, the Labor party is probably as fragmented today as Canada's Progressive Conservative party was before the Brian Mulroney era.

One of the causes of its disunity is Peres himself. A distinguished personality with an unsurpassed record of public service, Peres announced last autumn that he would not run in the next election. Having been handily swept aside by Likud challenger Benjamin Netanyahu in the direct prime ministerial race, Peres seemed ready to resign and, in an intergenerational change, to relinquish the reins of power to a younger person.

But Peres had his own plans, making it known that he wished to be appointed party president. The idea appealed to some insiders: Beilin, his protege; Nissim Zvilli, the party secretary-general; and Avraham Burg, chair of the Jewish Agency. But Barak, Peres' would-be-successor, was opposed, saying the new post would "create two power centres" and distract attention from the goal of bringing down the Netanyahu government.

As this issue simmered, Peres put out feelers to Netanyahu for a national unity government, claiming he wanted to save the faltering peace process. Barak balked, convinced that Peres' eagerness to join the Likud as Labor's senior representative was a thinly-disguised ploy to retain his primacy no matter who was elected to succeed him as party chair.

The Bar-On affair extinguished the prospect of a national unity government, but did not dampen Peres' hope of being acclaimed president. Peres, due to Barak's opposition, was fighting an uphill battle. As the party convention to resolve the burning question approached, Peres accused Barak of engendering "an atmosphere of intimidation."

In the showdown two weeks ago, Barak prevailed, persuading 62 percent of the delegates to rebuff Peres and thereby effectively end his career. But in triumph, Barak caused a rift in the party.

The fissure has been widened by Beilin's scathing attacks on Barak, a security hawk who came out against the 1995 Oslo 2 agreement. Beilin, who belongs to the dovish wing of the party, has charged Barak with "fudging" his views and pandering to right-wing voters.

Barak, in turn, has chided Beilin for undermining the party. Given these polemics, it is debatable whether they will be able to work together.

Barak and Beilin, though, have narrowed their political differences with respect to the Palestinians since the party's seminal decision on May 14 to recognize the Palestinian people's right to self-determination in an independent state with limited sovereignty. Beilin always supported the concept, but until recently, Barak did not.

The face of summer heats up with a multitude of colors. Soft, sorbet-hued pastels dance with bold, daring colors shimmering with frost and shine.

Hot humid days demand staying power, so choose long-wearing products. Lighten up your cleansing and moisturizing regime; lotions are usually the best choice for the summer months.

Make sunscreen part of your daily routine, because UV rays are as damaging on cloudy days as sunny days. This summer, a new range of tanning products means sunbathing is no longer necessary for an enviable tan.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE needs special attention. To avoid shiny skin, Lancome provides "Instant Matifying T. Zone," a velvety powder gel to keep the oiliest skin from shining. Clinique saves the day with "Take The Day Off Makeup Remover" — perfect for removing indelible lipstick and waterproof mascara.

Elizabeth Arden expands its Ceramide line with three new anti-aging products: "Lift Intensive Firming Lotion," "Time Complex Moisture Cream SPF 15" and "Advanced Time Complex Capsules." This incredible trio promises to reduce the appearance of dark spots, create an immediate lifting effect and reduce the appearance of fine lines.

Biotherm's, "Profil'Up," a new cellulite and firming gel, tones, lifts and slims. Your skin will be bathing suit ready after one application. Clinique's "City Block Oil-Free Daily Face Protector SPF 15" can be worn under foundation or sun products. Lancome's two new products — "Self-Tanning Lotion" and "Sun Tan Prolonger Refreshing Gel" — both assure exceptional protection from harsh UV rays. They contain an ingenious replica of natural melanin that keeps your skin bronzed all year. Christian Dior's "Instant Glow Self-Tanner" for face and body gives your skin a golden tan in just one hour; re-apply after three hours for a deeper glow. The tinted, lightweight formula makes application easy and streak free.

FOUNDATION helps balance skin tones. Apply it sparingly; a little goes a long way. Try Lancome's "Teint Idole," new formula that resists smudging from friction, weather or emotions. Say good-bye to touch-ups and dreadful stains on collars. Its light, supple texture provides comfort and a perfectly unified matte finish.

HAIR coloring is easy with Christian Dior's "Mascara Flash." Exactly like lash mascara, it comes in colors like champagne, chestnut and paprika — just to name a few. Just brush on streaks, let dry, brush and like magic, you have these gorgeous highlights. Safe for the hair and disappears after the first wash.

LIPS AND EYES this summer are soft and subtle. Elizabeth Arden's "Lip and Eye Fix" should be a makeup staple. Use regularly to avoid color fading. Color is back, particularly for lips. Pink Veil from Chanel and Orange Punch from Eye color pastels

Dior, say summertime in the city. Eyes are dusted with soft colored hues like Honey Bunch "Stay the Day Eye Shadow," defined with "Pewter Eye Shading Pencil" and topped with "Jet Black Naturally Glossy Mascara," all from Clinique. Don't miss Chanel's eye color pastels — Glacier/Sky/Honey — they are exquisite.

FRAGRANCE this season is fresh and light. "Allure" from Chanel is a fresh, clean, soft and sexy oriental scent. "Eau Vitaminee" a fragrance mist from Bio Therm, tones, vitalizes and smells like a fresh summer morning. Dior's "Dolce Vita Perfumed Body Mist" is available for only the summer months. Its light feather-like sensation cuddles the skin in perfumed softness — perfect for warm, breezy nights. Lancome's "Poeme De Bain" presents four sensational products — creme, lotion, gel and soap that make bath time a delicious pleasure.

Klezmer CD has wide influences

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — In the region that David Buchbinder refers to as "the golden horseshoe of Yiddish music" – stretching roughly from Odessa on the Black Sea down through western Ukraine, Moldova and Romania – klezmer musicians of the last century likely didn't know from electric cellos, Cuban percussion instruments and the bansuri, an Indian flute.

These are some of the instruments that accompany the more traditional violin, accordian, clarinet, trumpet and percussive sounds found on Fire, the recently- released third CD album of the Toronto-based Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band.

According to Buchbinder, who is the band's leader, the music played on the CD "reflects the fact that we are all urban Canadian musicians playing at the end of the 20th century...exposed to a whole range of sound from jazz to Afro-Cuban music to European art (classical) music to funk."

One tune, Dig, "sounds the way klezmer music might have sounded if Cuba had been dropped into the Black Sea," he acknowledged.

Guest vocalist Adrienne Cooper of New York, one of the leading exponents of contemporary Yiddish vocal music, performs on four numbers.

Musicianship is supplied by band-members Buchbinder on trumpet, Paul Pacanowski on clarinet, Sasha Luminsky on accordion, Bucky Berger on drums and Artie Roth on bass, as well as guest musicians Steven Greenman, Rick Shadrach Lazar, Richard Armin and Ernie Tollar.

The playing on Fire attains extra energy because the album was recorded live, not in a studio setting like its two predecessors. "We always felt that we were a live band," Buchbinder said. "This album benefits from the spark that you can get only from a live audience."

Since the CD's release, the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band has acquired a new member: vocalist David Wall, who also adds some percussion. Toronto audiences have an opportunity to hear the popular band at the Ashkenaz festival at Harbourfront in late August. (Call 416-973-3000 for information.) The CD is available at many record and Judaica shops around town. Inquiries: phone 800-329-0757, e-mail [wonder @global.com.]

The "Jewish" Violin: What is it about the classical violin that marks it so distinctively as a Jewish instrument? Zina Schiff, backed only by Cameron Grant on piano, succeeds in bringing out an apparently intrinsic Jewish quality of the violin on the recent CD King David's Lyre in playing that has been variously described as soulful, moody and complex.

Schiff, who has performed as soloist with many major orchestras internationally, devotes the title piece – King David's Lyre, by German-born Israeli composer Hanoch Jacoby – to a commemoration of the Jerusalem 3000 anniversary. The piece, which Jacoby claimed to have completed the day Israel attained statehood in 1948, is based on a Talmudic legend describing the midnight breeze that would rustle the strings of David's lyre, inspiring him to compose psalms.

Other selections recall an enticing list of early and mid-20th-century Judaic composers such as Joseph Achron, Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, Efrem Zimbalist, Mischa Elman, even George Gershwin.

Recorded by 4-Tay Records, New York. Inquiries: phone 516-797-9166, e-mail [jamesarts @worldnet.att.net.]

A Capella: What do you call a pop-klezmer Jazz-Yiddish Hebrew country-western band with no instruments?

The members of Listen Up! a capella band – the name is Shimu Na in Hebrew – are young, hip and Jewish. Their first CD, Listen Up!, proves that they are eclectic as well. Selections range from Under The Chupah, a take-off of the Drifters' 1960s hit Under the Boardwalk, to the far more reverential Shehechiyanu and Ki L'Olam Chasdo, both from the Hebrew prayer-book.

Other tunes include Hineh Ba HaShalom, Jewish Food Jive, Chai, Yerushalayim Shel Zahav and Hatikvah. Chicago-area performers Mike Mendelson, Ron Packowitz and Rebecca and Steve Singer amply demonstrate their ability to harmonize well in both Hebrew and English.

Inquiries: phone 773-973-3428, website [http://orion.it.luc.edu/~ssinger/ third.html.]

Bitter Apples hits stage

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Bitter Apples is a play about three generations of Jewish women coping with Jewish identity in the Diaspora.

Written by Victoria Keidan of Alliston, Ont., the play has won the annual Canadian Jewish Playwriting contest.

It will be given two staged concert readings directed by Kevin Sheard — on June 8 at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre and June 15 at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, both at 8 p.m.

The four characters in Bitter Apples are a mute, overbearing diabetic grandmother; a caregiver daughter who buys her French fashion magazines and Belgian chocolates, and two granddaughters.

Their home, according to writer Keidan, could be in any large city with a ghettoized community and the play is relevant to anyone who asks what it means to be a Jew in Canada.

Despite the serious subject, the playwright says Bitter Apples has many comedic elements as the characters cope with being Jewish in the Diaspora.

Keidan is the author of many other plays some of which have been produced in Toronto.

In 1993, she told The CJN that she credits her grandmother with convincing her to live as a Jew, even though her own parents divorced when she was a girl and she lived apart from the Jewish community.

SOTHEBY'S JUDAICA SETS WORLD RECORDS

An international auction record for an item of Judaica ritual silver was set recently when a private American collector, bidding by phone, offered nearly four times the estimate for a silver gilt Sabbath lamp from Fuerth, dated to 1780. The lamp, from the legendary Sassoon Collection, fetched $552,500 (US).

Another highlight of the sale of important Judaica, which took place in a Tel Aviv hotel, was the Sassoon silver miniature Torah ark, which brought $118,000. A large silver kiddush cup from Fuerth, by the same maker as the Sabbath lamp, J. Rimonim, fetched $23,000, while a German silver spice tower from the same period also fetched $23,000.

An oil by Isidor Kaufmann, Portrait of a Yeshiva Boy, brought $112,500 while a monumental oil by John Rogers Herbert, The Tribes of Israel Discovering Joseph's Chalice in Benjamin's Possession achieved $107,000. In addition, a set of 17 lithographic plates of scenes of the Holy Land, 1842, by David Roberts, brought in $23,000.

A sale of 19th- and 20th-century art saw Reuven Rubin's oil, Rider with Bouquet, going for nearly triple its estimate at $283,000, while Marc Chagall's Femme Allongee was knocked down at $167,500. In all, Sotheby's officials assert that this was the most successful sale in Israel in years. The auction house has been operating in Israel for 13 years.

Music, Theatre, Painting

• Jewish Theatre Projects presents Passed Over, a play that "delves into the Jewish experience to explore oppression in the community." In conjunction with Leah Posluns Theatre and the Bathurst Jewish Centre. June 1, 2:30 p.m. at Leah Posluns Theatre. Also June 8, 1:15 p.m. at the Poor Alex Theatre. $10. 416-870-8000.

• Moon in June Productions presents an evening of entertaining tales and toe-tapping melodies from the Middle East, Africa, the British Isles and Eastern Europe.

Featured artists include storyteller Alec Gelcer, guitarist Brian Katz, and writer/performer Dorothy Lichtblau. May 29, 8 p.m. Bloor JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. Tickets $10.

• Toronto Senior Strings performs June 5, 2 p.m., St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, near St. Andrew subway, Toronto. $10. 416-769-5071.

• Vignettes: A Selection of Paintings on Paper, August 1996-January 1997, by American artist Helen Frankenthaler, is on view at Gallery One, Toronto, June 3 to July 2. 416-929-3103.

New Books of Note

• Written in Memory: Portraits Of The Holocaust (Chronicle Books), a new large-format book by photographer Jeffrey Wolin, presents a collection of some 50 simple photographs of survivors poised against backgrounds of their own hand-printed testimonies. The result is fully in keeping with Elie Wiesel's observation that "The Holocaust in its enormity defies language and art, and yet both must be used to tell the tale, the tale that must be told."

• What's next for New York author Mark Kurlansky now that his timely fish story Cod: A Biography of the Fish That Changed the World (Knopf, $27.95) has been released into this season's literary stream? A study of whitefish or the much rarer gefilte? A former Maclean's correspondent, Kurlansky's previous titles include The Chosen Few: The Resurrection of European Jewry.

• Bloomsbury has produced a handy paperback of Shine: the Screenplay, by Jan Sardi ($15.95). The recent Oscar-nominated film catapulted pianist David Helfgott to brief celebrity even as it led Helfgott's sister to mount a media campaign because it painted their father in what she considered too harsh a light.

• The Canadian Federation of Friends of Museums has released Significant Treasures ($29.95), a combination art book and educational resource highlighting 131 museums from coast to coast. Among the items depicted are a Torah crown from the Baycrest's Kanner Heritage Museum, a Holocaust badge from the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, and the Kaifeng Megillah from the Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum of Beth Tzedec, all of Toronto.

Grants & Awards

• UJA Federation is inviting applications for Jewish Continuity Culture grants ranging from $1,000 to $5,000 per project, up to a possible maximum of $30,000 in total grant awards. Deadline June 27. Call Lil at 416-635-2883, ext. 111.

Anthology traces poet's discovery of her role in Judaism

By SIDURA LUDWIG
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Carol Rose's premier anthology of poetry, Behind the Blue Gate, is the journey of a woman as she discovers her role in Judaism. Rich in vivid images and mesmerizing rhythms, the anthology introduces Rose as one of the Jewish community's crafted poets.

Behind the Blue Gate is divided into five sections, each highlighting a different aspect of the speaker's journey. The first section, titled Whenever I Return, is composed of poems about Israel and the speaker's relationship to the country. One poem, The Wall, likens the speaker's attachment to the city to an intense love relationship. It begins, "In Jerusalem / I always come / Face to face / With my longing." Israel, in this section, is a home filled with politics, comfort, conflict and peace.

Rose captures the diversity of the Holy Land through her descriptions of the women and the dichotomy of their lives. In particular, in Passover Eve, Rose's combination of "blood on the door" with dancing "woman-spirits" provides the reader with an effective example.

In the second section, The Crones, Rose explores the role of women in the history of Judaism. Many of the poems focus on female, biblical characters, such as Miryam, Jochebed and Bitya. The poems in this section echo the frustrations of women who feel they have been excluded or their role in Judaism ignored in history. Rose plays not only with rhythmic diversity in these poems, but with visual space as well, such as in the poem Echo Location.

Equally as tangible in their descriptions as the poems in the first section, these poems are possibly the strongest in the collection. Bound tightly by Rose's intense exploration of biblical women, they seem to represent the voices of generations of Jewish women.

The following two sections are weaker in visual imagery than the other poems. Rose's focus becomes personal, with the speaker exploring her sexuality. The speaker traces a history of abuse through to an eventual reconciliation with herself, as she finds a relationship which is both fulfilling and safe.

Poems such as Kitchens of My Childhood and Alone in His Bed are chilling accounts of abuse. In particular, Kitchens appears as a flood of memories, flashing the image before the reader. In these two sections, Rose tries to play more with the shaping of words and phrases, than with the conjuring of images. At times, the poems appear heavy in their wording and unclear in their intent.

The final section, Behind Blue Gate, concludes the speaker's journey as she has grown to become a caregiver, mother and spiritualist. The poems are intergenerational, showing the speaker's relationship with her children as they go through Jewish celebrations such as a brit and a wedding.

In the poem, Tears Splintering the Night, the speaker becomes a learned guide to her daughter who questions her about the Holocaust. In the poem Morning Prayer, the speaker further evolves as a spiritual leader as she creates her own prayer. The speaker reconciles herself with her home in Jerusalem and in the end appears comfortable with herself spiritually, maternally and sexually.

Rose's poems have appeared in numerous literary journals and anthologies. In 1994, she received the second prize in the Stephen Leacock Poetry competition. Behind the Blue Gate showcases her talent as an artist who can paint diverse pictures and images with her words.

Holy Blossom company staging Shmulnik's Waltz

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Holy Blossom Temple's Stagecraft Company is presenting its fifth production, Shmulnik's Waltz, May 29, May 31 and June 1, 7:30 p.m. at the temple.

The play, directed by Michael Ryval, was recently performed off-Broadway and follows the turn of the century pattern of Jewish immigration from shtetl to the Lower East Side of New York.

"The Stagecraft Company selected this play because of its richness in human feelings, portrayed in the tradition of Shalom Aleichem," says Roberta Presser, a Stagecraft actor and producer.

The company, says Presser, "has become a full-fledged Jewish repertory theatre since its inception less than three years ago when temple members, Joanne and Joel Rose, decided to start up a theatre group to provide a creative outlet for Jewish expression."

After its first production, G-d of Vengeance, in which three people turned up for the original rehearsal, the company put on Golda, which drew an audience of more than 600. The next two plays were A Body of Water, which portrayed water through the use of three Jewish rituals, and Crossing Delancey.

With 30 core members, the company "still retains the openness that made it so exciting at the start," says Presser. "It now has an executive who formulates policy and approves new plays proposed by company members and it is completely self-supporting."

Zimriya to feature Ladino composition

Milton Barnes

TORONTO — This year's choral Zimriya will feature a new work specially composed for the occasion by Milton Barnes, entitled Sefarad.

Based on Ladino folk songs, the work covers a range of moods, from the solemn prayer of Respondemos to the lilting guitar-like lullaby Durme and the uptempo Noches Noches.

Over the years, Milton Barnes has composed for orchestras and chamber groups throughout the country, as well as such artists as Erica Goodman, Moshe Hammer and Ofra Harnoy. His works combine his years of training and performance in classical, jazz and popular music.

Sefarad makes a thrilling sound when sung by the massed choirs of the Zimriya Chorus. It will form the climax of an evening entitled A World of Jewish Music - the sounds and rhythms of the Diaspora, including songs from Sephardi culture, Yiddish, Chassidic, Western and North American traditions.

The Zimriya, organized by Jewish Music Toronto, is an annual highlight of the Jewish Music scene. This year's participants include the Zemer Chorale, Beth Tikvah, Holy Blossom and the Jewish Folk Choir, as well as the Heritage Singers and Neimot Singers, returning after a long absence from the event.

"We encourage choirs from the entire Toronto area to participate in this exciting event," organizer Charles Heller said. "There are so many groups who could join us – we look forward to hearing more of them at future events."

The Zimriya will be held at Adath Israel Congregation, 37 Southbourne Ave., North York, on June 3 at 8 p.m. Admission is by suggested donation of $5.

Singles Registry's Open House = Full House

They came, they saw, they registered. The excitement was brewing as the Jewish Singles Registry (J.S.R.) recently held its very first "open house" a few weeks ago. J.S.R. Director Rob Singer reports that the turnout was exceptional with their sparkling new headquarters at 55 Eglinton Ave. E., #405, filled to capacity. Singer proudly notes that the open house showed how fun and easy it is for Jewish singles to meet in this kind of atmosphere.

New computer system a big success

The whole premise behind the Jewish Singles Registry is to provide their members with all the necessary information to make informed and quality dating choices. J.S.R.'s new state of the art computer system does just that. Members still get to read detailed biography profiles on each other, see photographs, and now exclusive to J.S.R. members, they get to listen to recorded voice messages. The system is safe, fun, and most important, very simple to use.

Here come the bride(s)

Midway through 1997, J.S.R. is delighted to report that 5 couples have already announced their engagements and more announcements concerning upcoming nuptials are expected soon. Singer notes that there are many couples presently involved in "serious" relationships at the moment. "Given the huge increase in new members lately we expect that number to rise even higher," he says.

Personalized service

With almost 1,400 members registered in Toronto alone and an additional 250 from Montreal, the J.S.R. continues to provide unparalleled personalized service. There are now 3 professionals on staff at the J.S.R. who members can turn to when they need advice, suggestions or are just looking for feedback from a previous date.

See for yourself

At the J.S.R. they know how important it is to have someone special in your life, a person to talk to, and laugh with, and to share life's ups and downs with. They also know how difficult it is to meet that someone special. Their goal is to make it easy, by giving you the opportunity to choose who you think would be right for you. Whether you are looking for friendship, a relatiohnship, or something in between, the J.S.R. is the right choice. Go in and see for yourself. Call them today at (416) 483-4151. E-mail jsreg@total.net.

For fan or lighting, Royal's the best

Royal Lighting's selection of lights, fixtures and fans, Toronto's best, matches every budget, need and taste. There's everything here from ceiling fans to outdoor lights, in every style from modern to traditional.

Want to keep cool this summer? Try fans. They eat up less electricity than air conditioning; one fan uses about the same power as a 60 watt bulb. Also, as they don't lower the air temperature, they free us from the strain of body temperature adjustments caused by going in and out of air-conditioned rooms. Instead, they cool us by moving air over our skin and drawing heat off.

In many 2 storey houses, though, the top floor is often too hot in summer, even with air conditioning; and fans remedy this. For example, a properly positioned stairwell fan turns a heat trap into a conduit that moves a refreshing air current through your home.

In stock and on sale, Royal Lighting has over 70 styles of fan, and is Ontario's largest dealer for the most popular make, Casablanca. Other brands include Can-Arm, SMC and Kendall. Prices range from $59.99 to $1,199.99, with warranties from 5 years to lifetime.

Ceiling fans' popularity is growing. Today, most are reversible: that is, they blow air downward in summer, making a cooling breeze; and in winter, they blow upward, drawing cooler air from the lower part of the room and pushing warm air down from the ceiling. Also, they disperse tobacco smoke.

Ceiling fans come with lights, or lights can be added, letting you replace fixtures with fans. They come in 32", 36", 42" and 52" sizes, in many different styles and colours, with pull chains, wall switches or remote control. Some can be set to turn on automatically at a certain temperature — and, for security, to turn lights on and off at random times.

Looking forward to warm summer evenings? Royal stocks a wide range of outdoor fixtures including low-voltage lights, garden sets, and garage and outside door fixtures — both for nighttime safety and convenience, and a pleasant outdoor atmosphere.

Royal's experienced, well-informed staff make sure you go home with the product you want. Royal also helps you economize — buying bulbs by the case, for instance, or finding a new shade for a fine old lamp. You'll find Royal Lighting at 1549 Avenue Rd., call 782-1129.

The Shining Jewel of Avenue Rd. North

A Show of Hands has become the shining jewel of Avenue Road North — a must see on the Avenue spring day shopping circuit. Owner/Curator Sara Levine Petroff continually strives to source truly exceptional one of a kind pieces from hand blown glass, ceramics, jewellery, to distinctive contemporary Judaica, in a wide range of prices, for both private and corporate art collections.

A Show of Hands has an interior designer on staff to help ensure that colour, proportion, lighting and placement are considered when selecting craft works for your home or as a gift. If you have your own interior designer or decorator to work with, the gallery does offer a courtesy discount to the trade.

We are well versed in the protocol of gift giving, ensuring that each piece is a signed and dated original work, accompanied by an artist statement and biography. Whether you choose to recognize an engagement, birthday or wedding, a significant milestone, or an employee's exceptional performance, A Show of Hands will work with you to ensure that from selection to delivery, both giving and receiving will truly be a pleasure.

After 13 years, A Show of Hands Contemporary Craft Gallery has become the choice destination for unique, inspired gifts. If you have never been to the gallery, be sure to make it one of your first stops on the Avenue.

Cancer research centre launched in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Cancer patients in Montreal should have access to drugs under development much earlier than now because of a new applied research centre based at the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) that aims to shorten the time it takes to bring a laboratory discovery to treatment form.

The McGill Centre for Translational Research in Cancer is so-called because it "translates" new scientific knowledge into clinical application, said Dr. Gerald Batist, the centre's director.

The centre is the first of its kind in Canada and one of very few in North America.

It takes an average of 10 years to get an idea from the lab to the stage where it is safe and effective for patient use, Batist said, far too long for a cancer sufferer who is not responding to available treatments.

Dr. Gerald Batist

"By providing the infrastructure and expertise to bring together laboratory researchers, cancer specialists and [the pharmaceutical] industry, we will be able to offer promising new treatments to patients as early as anywhere in the United States," he said.

The centre includes a clinical research unit where patients are treated.

Batist, a JGH oncologist with expertise in experimental pharmacology, heads 25 researchers representing a number of McGill University and universités de Montréal and du Québec à Montréal departments including biology, immunology, pharmacology, pathology, pediatrics and other related medical fields, as well as experts from the pharmaceutical industry.

"Our centre is taking advantage of Quebec's strong environment for biotechnology and research and development," he said. "The development of novel therapeutics is extremely expensive, both in the discovery stages, as well as during preclinical and clinical development.

Among the initial projects at the centre are those concerning gene therapy and medicines that may be derived from natural sources. In the former case, scientists are studying how introducing genes into a tumor may halt its growth. The latter project is inspired by the development of Taxol, a drug derived from the bark of the Pacific yew, which, Batist pointed out, took 20 years to reach the market.

Dr. Richard Margolese, a centre member and director of the JGH oncology department, emphasized that no compromise will be made in the JGH's current protocol to ensure the safety of patients participating in clinical trials.

Much of the lag from conception to practical application is due to the isolation in which researchers at different hospitals and universities work and the lack of communication between them and the doctors who can administer and evaluate new drugs, or even among themselves, said McGill dean of medicine, Dr. Abraham Fuks.

The centre will help coordinate these various efforts and thereby accelerate the testing of potentially life-saving therapies.

The partnership with the drug industry will facilitate technology transfer and commercial agreements, Batist said, but the centre will retain control of the development of the researchers' findings. The centre will hold the patent on any drugs produced commercially.

Typically, scientists sell their ideas to pharmaceutical companies, which then develop the drug themselves, often conducting trials outside of Montreal, he said.

The centre has been established with a $2 million donation from the Alexander and Goldfarb Family Foundations, a $1 million grant from the National Scientific and Engineering Research Council, and additional funding from the Montreal Breast Cancer Foundation.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its third annual Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking readers to submit photographs which relate to the theme celebrating 100 years of Zionism. They must be original photos "shot" by the reader.

Who can enter: Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

How to enter: A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please write your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

You may mail or deliver your photos to: CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ont., M3B 3K4.

The contest closes at 5 p.m. on Monday, Sept. 8, 1997.

Prizes: The judges will choose three photographs which, in their opinion, are the most expressive and evocative. The "winning" submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the "winners" will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the "winners." We may also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified: Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before Shabbat on Sept. 19, 1997.

When the prizes will be awarded: The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Oct. 2, 1997. Cheques will be sent shortly thereafter.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Regie des Loteries et courses du Quebec.

Baycrest begins Parkinson's program

TORONTO — The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has launched a new program, the first of its kind in the Greater Toronto Area, for people recently diagnosed with Parkinson's disease.

Called the Parkinson's Early Intervention Pilot Program, it was developed by Baycrest's physiotherapy and occupational therapy departments, and offers education and special exercises to help slow the disabling symptoms that can accompany the condition.

"We conducted a comprehensive assessment of out-patient services and held focus groups with clients and their families," says Baycrest physiotherapist Rebecca Gruber. "Both clearly indicated the need for more and better professional services for those who are newly diagnosed."

Medications are commonly used in the early stages of the condition to control such direct effects as tremor and rigidity, she says. However, it is believed that using physiotherapy early on could slow the indirect effects, such as loss of muscle and joint flexibility.

"Unfortunately, the current practice is to send clients to us in the later stages of the condition when the problems are more severe and difficult to treat," says Gruber. "We hope to show that referrals to physiotherapy should be made sooner."

Parkinson's is the most common progressive neurological condition in the elderly, affecting about one percent of Canadians over 65. Its main symptoms are tremor, rigidity, slowness of movement and difficulties with balance.

In the new Baycrest program, clients and their partners attend two-hour sessions twice weekly for 10 weeks. Each session is led by an occupational therapist or physiotherapist and includes one hour of education followed by an hour of instruction in specialized exercises. The program also assesses each participant's level of functioning and provides referrals to other Baycrest and community services.

For more information, call Baycrest at 416-785-2500, ext. 2683.

Judicial independence revisited

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Documents filed recently in the Supreme Court of Canada on alleged government interference in war crimes cases were given exposé treatment by two major Canadian newspapers but are really just "old news," say spokespersons for two Jewish organizations.

The allegations contained in the documents have already been addressed by Chief Justice Charles Dubin in an internal review commissioned by the Justice Department and by the Canadian Judicial Council, which investigated the conduct of Federal Court Judges Julius Isaac and James Jerome, say Keith Landy, national legal counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress and Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

Dubin concluded Justice Department official Ted Thompson was responsible for only a "minor error in judgment" while the Judicial Council cleared Isaac, Chief Justice of the Federal Court of serious wrongdoing.

"This is not a new chapter, it's only an old chapter" in the controversy over alleged judicial interference, Littman said.

The two stories, which appeared in the Globe and Mail and the Ottawa Citizen, quote internal government memos written by Christopher Amerasinghe, a senior lawyer with the Justice Department's war crimes unit. They focus on a March 1, 1996 meeting between Thompson and Isaac in which the slow pace of proceedings in war crimes cases was discussed.

The meeting prompted defence lawyers to seek a stay of proceedings on the grounds of judicial interference. Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen granted the stay but the Federal Court of Appeal overturned that judgement. The Supreme Court will hear an appeal from that decision next month.

Memos by Amerasinghe suggest Thompson had a close personal relationship with Isaac and that Thompson told him Isaac would speak to Jerome and get him to remove himself from the cases. According to the news stories, Amerasinghe also writes in his memos that Isaac and Thompson had dinner on March 1, 1996 and again discussed the war crimes cases.

Amerasinghe also wrote that Thompson later met Jerome in Montreal and the judge suggested he not file an affidavit to explain the meetings. Amerasinghe warned that could lead to the "clear inference that the fix was in" and he described the relationship between Thompson and Isaac as "incestuous."

Amerasinghe also advises against calling Thompson as a witness to explain the meetings with Isaac, saying his testimony would be harmful to the government.

Landy said the documents are troubling because "there appears to be dissension in the department. There appears to be a lack of cohesiveness as to what the aim of the department was."

He said many of Amerasinghe's memos are based on speculation.

Race tight in Edmonton

By NEIL LOOMER
Edmonton Jewish Life

EDMONTON — Although there are only 5,000 Jews out of a general population of 700,000 in Edmonton, the concentration of Jewish homes in two ridings means the community's vote can have an impact on the federal election.

Election '97

Edmonton Northwest includes the downtown area around the city's two oldest synagogues, where many senior citizens have retired to high-rise condos. It also includes the established Glenora community, Edmonton's equivalent of Forest Hill.

The riding is held by Liberal Anne McLellan, the minister of Natural Resources. In 1993, she won by only 11 votes over the Reform party candidate.

Despite her high profile as a cabinet minister and her success in consolidating the Armed Forces at the Edmonton Garrison, many still expect a close race. A former law professor at the University of Alberta, McLellan was recruited to move to Edmonton 16 years ago from the Maritimes by a former classmate, Bruce Elman, a past president of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton.

McLellan's Reform opponent, Dean Kurpjuweit, is a newcomer to politics who is hoping to steal one of the few seats Reform does not hold in the Edmonton area.

It's the opposite situation in Edmonton Southwest, where former school trustee Esther Starkman is representing the Liberals against incumbent Ian McClelland of Reform.

The Jewish community has drifted to this area over the past 20 years and will see the opening of a new Talmud Torah in the heart of the riding this fall.

McClelland expects to garner some support from Jewish voters. He was a business partner for 25 years with Louis Rudolph, a pioneer of Edmonton's Jewish community. McClelland recently travelled to Israel with Canadian Jewish Congress and has spoken out in the House of Commons on the failure of the government to prosecute alleged Nazi war criminals.

Starkman, a long-time Liberal, is well known in both the Jewish and general communities for her professional and volunteer work in education.

Another factor that could hurt McClelland is a strong run by the Progressive Conservatives, who held the riding before the last election.

Montreal native Ellie Shuster is representing the Tories. A one-time journalist and speech writer for former Saskatchewan premier Grant Devine, Shuster is stressing national unity in her campaign.

She says she is inspired by her great-grandfather, the first Jewish alderman in Montreal, who ran a bilingual campaign with signs in Yiddish and Italian.

Israeli soccer having impact on world stage

JERUSALEM —Eyal Bercovic became a saint last October. But even though he's from the Holy Land, the 25-year-old soccer player's elevation in status has nothing to do with religion; rather it is due to his signing a three-year contract with the English premier league team Southampton, popularly called the Saints.

Bercovic began repaying the $2 million Southampton transferred to Maccabi Haifa for the midfielder's rights when he scored and assisted on three goals in his debut for the Saints, a 6-3 victory over English powerhouse Manchester United.

Bercovic, 25, is renowned for his incisive passing, a skill that helped him win two championships with Maccabi Haifa, while also representing Israel in 40 international matches.

Bercovic's success at Southampton has stimulated an exodus of Israeli soccer stars. Striker Ronen Harazi, who has scored 18 goals in 36 international appearances, was set to join English premier division team Sunderland from Betar Jerusalem, while Maccabi Tel Aviv midfielder Avi Nimni was being wooed by Sheffield. Defender Gadi Bromer and Israel's captain Tal Banin are also expected to join English clubs. Earlier in the season, the Spanish first division team Celta Vigo bought Haim Revivo from Maccabi Haifa.

Israeli soccer has improved by leaps and bounds in recent years. Here, two players fight for the ball in a game played in Israel.

Interest in Israeli players has been abetted by the remarkably good results achieved by Israel's national team in World Cup qualifying matches, where, at the end of April, Israel led Group 5 qualifiers with 13 points, two ahead of second place Russia. On April 30, Israel defeated Cyprus 2-0 at home, avenging a 2-0 loss to the Cypriots in Nikosia.

Israel faces Russia in an away game in June and Bulgaria in Sofia in August. Two wins would clinch a berth in the 1998 World Cup and would mark Israel's first appearance in the tournament since 1970. Israel has already defeated Bulgaria, World Cup semi-finalists, 2-1 at home and tied Russia 1-1 at home.

The success of Israeli players at top levels in Europe is not a new phenomenon. Ronny Rosenthal helped Liverpool win the English championship in 1990 and has been playing for Tottenham Hotspur since 1993. Before that, Avi Cohen won English and Scottish championships with Liverpool and Glasgow Rangers, respectively. Veteran Betar Jerusalem striker, Eli Ohana, 33, who was recalled to the national team recently and scored the vital winning goal in a World Cup qualifier against Luxembourg, won a European Cup winner's medal with the Belgian side, Mechelen, in 1990.

While Israel still faces an uphill battle in its bid to qualify for the World Cup, the omens for future success are good. The country's under-16 team won the bronze medal in the European Championships in Austria in 1996 and several of the team's top players have been signed by leading European sides.

Israel's under-18 team qualified for the final of the European Championships in July while its under-21 team leads its group for the European Championships in 1998.

Individually, Israeli athletes continue to shine. Shlomo Dahan, 17, scored well for the youth team of German champions Borussia Dortmund while Yossi Benayon, 17, is touted to become the greatest Israeli player ever. He scored 10 goals in the first half of the 1996/97 season for Ajax Amsterdam and was chosen the Dutch champions' most outstanding youth player of the year.

Hoops tournament to aid cancer research

TORONTO — The Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) will be the scene of a basketball tournament and blood drive on June 1 to raise funds and awareness for cancer research and bone marrow transplants.

Hoops for Hopes, formerly known as Play for Jay, is expected to attract as many as 400 participants, including media personalities from TSN, the New VR and CITYTV. Participants will play three on three basketball and from 12 to 1 p.m. the media will play a celebrity game.

Hoops for Hopes grew out of the Play for Jay tournament, which helped fund the testing of bone marrow donors for Jay Feinberg, then a 26-year-old cancer patient from New York. In 1995, the campaign found a donor to save his life.

"I am now a healthy 26-year-old, alive today because the gift of a stranger gave me the gift of life. My hope has become reality; I am leukemia free. With the continued support of generous sponsors and players, Hoops for Hopes can help other cancer patients find their life saving donors," he said.

Two years ago, Audey Stanleigh of Toronto found his donor from a drive organized by the Friends of Jay. Unfortunately, Stanleigh, who came up with the idea for the fundraising tournament, succumbed to post-transplant complications last summer. This year's event will be held in his memory.

"Audey Stanleigh was my best friend and I hope the community will support his legacy," said Ilan Meister, chief organizer of Hoops for Hope. "In 1995 we co-directed the tournament together to raise more than $20,000. This year we hope to...almost double our fundraising efforts."

In addition to the hoops action, a blood drive will be held to increase the number of potential donors on the international unrelated bone marrow registry. Dynacare Laboratories has donated medical supplies and its technical skills for the drive.

The official sponsor of the tournament is Brian Mermelstein Investments while Shoeless Joe's Sport Bar & Tavern, Dufferin and Orfus Road, will host a post-tournament party after 7 p.m. Proceeds from the $5 cover charge will go to the charity.

For more information, contact Meister at 905-771-9773.

The tournament takes place from 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. at the BJC, 4588 Bathurst St. The blood drive will run from noon to 5 p.m. Admission is $5 for spectators and $100 per team of three or four.

The Inside Back

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

כיצד מתחילים סיפור?

מתחילים סיפור מאת: עמוס עוז, כתר תוצאה לאור,1996, אינו ספר המסות הראשון של המחבר. ידוע לשבח ספר המסות שתיקת השמים - ענינו משתנמם על אלוהים וכן ספרי המסות הפוליטיים באור התכלת חעזה ויפח רשם בארץ ישראל.

במתחילים סיפור, עוז, שכמעט הפך כסופר ואישיות ציבורית אגדה בחייו, שואל: מה בא בתחתלה? מה כותבים בפרק הראשון? מה יהיה המשפט הפותח? ובעצם מה זו בכלל התחלה? הלא תמיד "קיימת התחלה שלפני התחלה." תוך דיון ביצובעיה חשחורה הראשונה על פני הדף הלבן" עוז מתלבט בסוגיות נוקפות. התכנים הם מעולם הספרות והפילוסופיה ונושאי מחקרו של עוז נוגעים בהבחנות הדקות בין סיבה לעילה, בין נורם למניע, טיבו של הדימוי והיחסים המורכבים בין תדמית, עובדה, אמונה, ודאות ואמת.

הספר מיוחד ורווי באוצרות מחוראת הספרות. וכי מה יכול לחיות רע בש"י עגנון, קפקא, גוגול, סי יזהר, י. שבתאי ואחרים תחת פלפולו המרתק של עוז.

עמוס עוז סוגד לקהל הקוראים. לא קדושת הסופר לנגד עיניו אלא קדושת הקריאה. הוא דובר לא כסופר מרץ אלא כאחד מן חשורה, כקורא מן המנין. כתיבתו קלילה ונוטלת יומרנות יתר. פניתו אינה למעגל אקדמי אלא לקוראיו בפועל ובפוטנציה.

בין השאר, הסופר מבקש לתקן עוול שעוללו כמה מורים לספרות "שניתחו בפנינו הכל בכל, עד דכא, טכניקות ומוטיבים... אלגוריה וקונוטציה... ורק את התענוג שבקריאה סירסו קצת, שלא יפריע; שנדע לנו שספרות זה לא משחק ובכלל, שהחיים לא פיקניק." מתוך אהבתו לדמיון הספרותי, עוז מדגים משחקי קריאה המבקשים מן הקורא שישתתף השתתפות פעילה בקריאה "שיביא עמו אל חזירה את נסיון חייו ואת תמימותו וגם זהירתו ועורמתו." לדעת הסופר, הקריאה מבוססת על שלב הפתיחה שבו כביכול נתחם חוזה בין הקורא והסופר.

במתחילים סיפור עוז בוחן סה"כ עשר יצירות; שבע התחלות של סיפורים ושלוש התחלות של רומאנים. הוא מפענח עבורנו את "חוזה הפתיחה" ביצירות שבחר ומעניק לנו הדרכה ספרותית מרתקת. חשיפתו לאור הבטים שיתכן ונעלמו מאתנו, הקוראים, מהווה תשורה ספרותית מתוקה.

יש התחלות, אומר עמוס עוז, כמו "הבל הבלים, אמר קהלת, הבל הבלים, הכל הבל" שפשוט מתמצות את הכל. ואולם רוב הפתיחות נזקקות להמשך הסיפור להצדקת קיומן.

הספר פותח באביו ומסיים בפרק הדן בסבתו של עוז: "חסיבה האמיתית למות סבתי." בסגנון לבבי ואישי מספר לנו עוז שסבתו נפטרה באמבטיה ובעקבות זאת הוא מבקש מענה לשאלה, האם נפטרה סבתו מהתקף לב או מנקיון. בדיון בדילמה זו, עוז מפנה את הקורא לקונסוליום פילוסופי, מלייבניץ ועד איינשטיין.

עמוס עוז, מתחילים סיפור: בהחלט מומלץ לכל מי שאוהב לקרוא, מי שרוצה לכתוב וסתם מאוהדי עמוס עוז. ספר חכם ומחנה.

ולהזדמנת פתיחה שאני אוהבת, בחרתי ברומאן מנוחה נכונה שבו מוצגת עמדה חדשה ומפתיעה בשאלת דיקונה הלאומי של מדינת ישראל. כנגד מיתוס הצבר בסיפורת של "דור הארץ", במנוחה נכונה הושמה דווקא בפי הגיבור הצבר בקורת נוקבת על ניתוק דור לילדי-הארץ ממורשת העם היהודי. וזהו משפט הפתיחה למנוחה נכונה: "איש קס ועובר ממקום למקום. מה שחשאיר האיש מאחוריו נשאר מאחוריו ומביט בגבו." עמוס עוז, מנוחה נכונה, ספריה לעם, 1982.

HAMBURGER UPSIDE-DOWN CASSEROLE

2 cups elbow macaroni, raw	8 oz can tomato sauce	3 eggs, beaten
1 small onion, minced	1/4 tsp pepper	1/2 cup water
1 garlic clove, minced	1/4 tsp salt	14 oz can asparagus spears
1-1 1/2 lb. ground beef	1/4 tsp oregano	Yield: 6 servings.

Preheat oven to 350°F. Cook macaroni according to package instructions. Spray large frying pan with cooking spray and sauté onion and garlic. Add ground meat. Cook, stirring constantly until the meat has browned. Add tomato sauce and spices.

Spread meat mixture into 2 qt. greased casserole dish. Arrange cooked macaroni over hamburger. Combine beaten eggs with water. Pour over macaroni. Bake 1 1/2 hrs. until custard is set. When done, allow casserole to stand 15 minutes, then loosen edges and unmold on platter. Decorate with asparagus around unmolded casserole. Cut into wedges.

About families

Dear Susan,

I have three young children. My in-laws live in Toronto and my parents reside in New York State. My parents see my children on a regular basis; however, my in-laws have virtually no contact. This situation appears to trouble me more than my husband. Do you have any suggestions?

Dear Reader,

Thank you for sharing your dilemma. Families have different capacities for closeness. This is predicated on an individual's capacity to connect on an emotional level. Dr. John Bolby, the father of attachment theory, described this process in his theory of bonding and attachment. An individual's capacity to bond stems back to the all-important bond between mother and child. This bond extends itself to father-child and sibling relationships. The degree to which one has bonded is played out in adult life in spousal relationships and parental spheres.

You have alluded to the fact that your family has no problem with attachment, even if it is geographically challenged. Your parents have kept in regular contact with your children. I assume that this is a style of relating that you are accustomed to.

Your husband appears disinterested because he appears to come from a disengaged family. Their comfort zone is not within the bosom of close relationships. It is your husband's decision as to whether he wants to reconnect with his parents in a more deliberate way, and wants his parents to have a closer relationship with your children.

I detect a pacing problem in that you wish for a closer relationship with your in-laws. You will have to follow your husband's lead when he chooses to dance the dance.

In the meantime, you might discuss how the children might be experiencing the disparities in grandparent involvement as a means of anticipating questions on their parts.

PA involved in murders: Israel

CJN Wire Services

JERUSALEM — In the wake of a foiled attempt by six Palestinians to abduct Palestinian land dealer Assad Rajibi, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu called an emergency meeting of senior security officials last week.

Among the subjects reported on the agenda for discussion was the possibility of suspending contact with the Palestinian Authority (PA).

Israel claims the PA has embarked on a calculated campaign of murdering Palestinians who sell land to Israelis.

In response to the abduction attempt, Netanyahu told army radio Galei Zahal: "The fact that there were and are murderous attacks on them [the land dealers] through or with the encouragement of the senior officials in the PA, is something we cannot accept. Such acts harm the idea of peace and coexistence between us and the Palestinians. We know that whoever does not respect his own people will not respect his neighbor. We will take all necessary steps to bring justice to those killed and prevent other murders."

Netanyahu added that Israel cannot accept attacks or murders on those holding Israeli identity cards, through the encouragement of senior members of the PA.

Last weekend, Israeli police prevented the murder of Palestinian land dealer, Assad Rajibi, Jerusalem police chief Yair Yitzhaki revealed.

Rajibi, 57, was abducted from his home near Hizma, northeast of Jerusalem by the six Palestinians, who forced him into a car and fled toward Ramallah, he said.

Jerusalem police spokesperson Shmuel Ben-Ruby said that acting

The rabbi of Kinshasa

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

Special Feature

MONTREAL — Highly confident about the future, Rabbi Shlomo Bentolila, the spiritual leader of the small Jewish community of the new Democratic Republic of Congo (formerly Zaire), is firmly convinced that the political-military crisis that has erupted there in recent months will soon be settled as the new strong man of Kinshasa, Laurent Kabila, comes to power.

"The Zairian people feel relief. The are breathing again. The anxiety, the dissension and the confusion are giving way to hope and to a fervent desire to rebuild this country which has been tested so painfully.

"The Zairians are peace-loving, tolerant and hospitable. They have always felt great admiration and affection for the Jewish community that lives among them," said Rabbi Bentolila, in a telephone interview with The CJN two days after the triumphant entry into Kinshasa of the rebel troops of the Alliance of Democratic Forces for the liberation of the Congo-Zaire.

A native of Montreal, this 32-year-old emissary of the Lubavitch movement has been living in the former Zaire since 1991, with his wife and his two children.

The Jewish community in the new Republic of Congo consists of some 200 families, 135 of whom live in the capital, Kinshasa. The others live in Lubumbashi and in the mining areas. The majority of Jews living in the country are francophone Sephardim from North Africa — Morocco, Tunisia, Algeria. The first Jews to settle there at the beginning of the century were from the Greek island of Rhodes. Three Canadian Jewish families — including Rabbi Bentolila's — currently live in Kinshasa.

"Our community is very united and structured. We are like a small family stubbornly trying to preserve and transfer to our children the rich spiritual and cultural heritage left to us by our ancestors. We live our Judaism within the framework of a fulfilling and dynamic community," the rabbi said.

The Jewish community of the former Zaire has a beautiful, spacious synagogue, a cultural and recreational centre, a library with several hundred works and a store that sells strictly kosher food as well as kosher meat imported from South Africa.

After Shabbat services, Rabbi Bentolila said, the members of the community attend a kiddush and eat lunch together. A kosher restaurant in the community centre is open one day a week.

Jewish education is a major priority for the members of the community. "Twice a week, we offer the children classes in Hebrew and Torah. Even if many of them are not at all religious, most of the members of our community are very aware that education is one of the basic foundations of Jewish identity."

La Presse story 'pernicious'

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — La Presse assistant publisher Claude Masson, in a meeting last Thursday with Jewish community officials, refused to back away from his newspaper's portrayal of a "Jewish criminal organization" running a money-laundering scheme.

Despite the civil tone of the one-hour encounter, Masson's continued defence of his French-language daily's coverage clearly disappointed the Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) delegation. "No, we are not satisfied," said David Sultan, director of CJC-Quebec's community relations department. "We want a recognition of their error.

Cemetery Shootings

QUEBEC CITY — The shooting of two caretakers of a Jewish cemetery near Quebec City late last month was a settling of accounts, police say.

One of the caretakers, who was shot five times by a would-be assassin, is a member of a local gang and known to police, officials said.

The second caretaker was slightly injured when a bullet ricocheted and struck his knee.

CJC Supports Mosque

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region, has come out in support of the building of a mosque in suburban Mississauga.

The region's community relations committee chair, Ellen Cole, has written Mississauga Mayor Hazel McCallion, urging the city to work "cooperatively" with the Canadian Islamic Trust Foundation in establishing a mosque, school, social hall and other facilities for the Muslim community.

Studies Complete

TORONTO — Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, will honor almost 50 adult students who have completed at least 120 hours of text study at an awards ceremony on June 8. The ceremony represents a celebration of five years in which Kolel has provided Liberal Jewish adult education in the community.

YTV Achievement

VANCOUVER — Vancouver native Nava Mizrahi, international president of B'nai Brith Girls, recently won a YTV achievement award for public service. Mizrahi, 18, was one of over 1,300 nominees Canada-wide for the 15 awards.

ISRAEL

Israel Festival

JERUSALEM — The 36th Israel Festival has begun, bringing together groups exemplifying the best of Eastern and Western cultures.

For 19 days, Jerusalem is transformed into an international cultural centre as hundreds of artists gather from Israel and countries from around the world.

Hopeful Signs

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said last week he hoped the election of a relative moderate in Iran's presidential elections would bring a "positive development" for Israel.

But Netanyahu stressed that it was still too early to draw conclusions about the implications of the Iranian elections.

Arab Hatred

JERUSALEM — Some 40 percent of Israeli high school students "hate Arabs" and 60 percent "want revenge," according to a survey released last week.

The study, conducted by Dr. Ofra Meisels of Haifa University and Dr. Reuven Gal of the Carmel Institute for Social Research, polled some 5,300 high school students from 84 Israeli schools.

The number of respondents who said they hated Arabs went up significantly in state religious schools, where 79 percent of girls studying in vocational tracks said they hated Arabs.

Rail Links

JERUSALEM — First you could drive, then you could fly. Now it won't be long before you can take the train from Israel to Jordan.

Ariel Sharon, Israel's national infrastructure minister, said last week that rail links would be built in the Dead Sea area, and between the Red Sea cities of Aqaba and Eilat.

THE LADY IS A RABBI

On June 3, the first woman rabbi in the history of American Judaism will be ordained in the 107-year-old Plum Street Reform Temple in Cincinnati, Ohio.

The idea, of course, is far from winning acceptance, even in Reform Judaism, not to mention the Conservative and Orthodox community.

When as a student rabbi, she was criticized for wearing a mini-skirt under her clergy robe in the pulpit, Sally Priesand explained that it's possible to function both as a rabbi and as a woman.

On her own marriage plans, "Rabbi Sally" said that anyone she would consider would have to realize how much the rabbinate means to her. However, she doesn't expect to marry a rabbi. As for children interfering with her clergywoman's life, she quipped: "I can even envision a nursery next to my study. A rabbi can have children."

WIESEL PRAISES 'SECOND CITY'

Elie Wiesel paid tribute to his affection for Toronto (his "favorite city after Jerusalem") by making it the site of his first fundraising speech. "They knew in New York I could not say no to Toronto," Wiesel quipped at the Toronto chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University annual dinner.

Coalition urges continuation of Branson services

By BEN ROSE
Staff Reporter

TORONTO —A revived Branson Hospital would offer all its services except 209 in-patient acute beds, The CJN has learned.

All out-patient, clinic and diagnostic services, including medical, would be retained, senior vice-president of Branson Brian Fenton said.

All day surgery, including those that need overnight stays in hospital, will continue and this already constitutes 80 to 90 percent of its total surgery, Fenton said.

His comments followed urgent appeals by the Canadian Jewish Congress, UJA Federation, the Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens and North York Mayor Mel Lastman to keep Branson open. It is one of 10 Metro area hospitals to be closed before the year 2000.

"It would be stupid for them to close Branson," Lastman told a media conference at Queen's Park. "Can you imagine someone suffering a heart attack taking three buses to get to another hospital?"

The coalition, which represents the Association of Jewish Seniors and the Bernard Betel Centre, is supporting the plan to keep Branson open as an urgent care and ambulatory care centre.

"We are being abandoned. It is ageism being used against us by the Ontario government," said Reta Duenisch-Turner, 70, of Bernard Betel.

"Please don't pull the plug on Branson Hospital," said Lastman, adding he doesn't know why Branson was picked for closing, considering it serves more seniors than any other hospital in Metro.

The conference was arranged by Monte Kwinter, Liberal MPP for Wilson Heights, in whose riding the hospital is located. "For weeks I've been reading petitions in the legislature every day to keep Branson open."

Metro Coun. Norm Gardner said there would be no saving in closing Branson because it would take $90 million in capital funds to replace Branson and provide beds and services in other hospitals.

Harold Brief of Congress and Alan Sandler of UJA Federation said 32,000 seniors depend on Branson, a figure that will rise to 40,000 in 10 years.

Sandler asked why Queensway General would be kept open as an ambulatory care centre, while Branson, which serves three times as many seniors, is closed.

Brief said Branson is particularly sensitive to the needs of the Jewish community.

Fenton told The CJN that 60 percent of the Branson hospital patients would go to Humber River Regional Hospital (formerly York-Finch) about 30 percent to North York General and 10 percent to York Central in Richmond Hill.

One difference if Branson is kept open is that patients could not be taken there in an ambulance , but if necessary, they would be transferred to another one by ambulance, Fenton said.

Lastman said North York General is already overburdened and could not cope with extra patients if Branson is completely closed.

Duenisch-Turner said Jewish seniors are worried about losing their physicians at Branson.

"If Branson is closed it represents an increasing risk for a vulnerable population," said Bea Levis, co-chair, Ontario Coalition, which has 500,000 members.

Human rights body to explore Zundel's material on Internet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A human rights hearing will continue Oct. 14, despite legal attempts to derail it by Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel.

Zundel's legal challenges to the jurisdiction of a Canadian Human Rights Commission tribunal were turned down last week by a three-person panel, which ruled that the tribunal was the appropriate forum to determine whether material posted on the Internet could be regulated.

Zundel's latest run-in with the law came as a result of complaints to the commission by the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations and by Sabina Citron, founder of the Canadian Holocaust Remembrance Association (CHRA). They allege an Internet site operated by Zundel presented material that exposed Jews to hatred or contempt. They cited three documents in particular: Did Six Million Really Die?, Jewish Soap and 66 Questions, and Answers on the Holocaust.

Prior to last week's hearing, Zundel attempted to challenge the jurisdiction of the tribunal before the Federal Court. The court turned down his requests that it dismiss referral of the issues to the tribunal.

Last week, Zundel's lawyer Doug Christie argued the Internet was not a telephonic communication and so, did not come under the Canadian Human Rights Act. He also contended that the complaint against Zundel was vexatious and made in bad faith and that the real creator of the Internet Web site, called "Zundelsite," was a woman named Ingrid Rimland, based in Carlsbad, Calif.

In dismissing Christie's arguments, tribunal chair Claude Pensa said the factual questions would be dealt with during the hearing.

The tribunal also reserved a de-

The Board of Jewish Education in Toronto is holding its annual Creative Writing Awards ceremony June 5. Twenty-seven students will be honored with special awards for the quality of their poetry and prose writing. Approximately 250 submissions from students in seven BJE-affiliated day schools and five BJE-affiliated supplementary schools were put before the BJE judges.

It is our pleasure to feature in this space, as we did last year, a small sampling of the writing that will be singled out for special commendation.

While the Shabbos Candles Burn

On Friday night in secrecy the candles would be lit.

At a place around the table
they would take their seats and sit.

For they were Marannos hiding from the Inquisition of Spain

They stayed though,
knowing all Jews would be slain.

But as they watched the light of the candles flicker on their faces

There seemed a hope of survival through all these terrible places.

We are like the candles burning for the wick stays high and bright.

Although we went through a lot of tragedies, we still light up the night.

We Were Slaves To Pharaoh In Egypt

The child tugs at my robe
I look down
There is a troubled look on his face.
Anxious to bring a smile to his lips,
I kneel and hug him
"Why so serious, my child?"
The child does not answer for a while
I wait.
At last he asks a question.
The child wants to know if I was once a slave.
I do not want to answer.
I look down at the child in my arms
So young,
So innocent,
Should I show him the scars on my back
Made by the cruel whip?
I think of the sights and screams
That live in my mind,
Haunt my dreams.
How can I tell the child of this?
Better to deny the past and shelter the child.
Then I look into the future,
My child will not know his legacy.
He will not understand what it says in the Torah
About Egypt, Pharaoh, the plagues,
the redemption,
My child will not comprehend
The miracles God has done for us.
He will not celebrate Pesach.
Nor my grandchildren.
Nor my great-grandchildren.
So I tell my innocent child,
"We were slaves to Pharaoh in Egypt."
The story will live on.

A Mitzvah For Our Time

The Schneider Garden Utilities warehouse was a large, damp, foreboding building. However, it was not empty, for a community of mice lived between the walls. The largest problem of this community was starvation. The only food the stomachs of the mice received were the meagre crumbs left over from the workers' lunches. Into this sorry state of affairs, a young mouse was born. They called her Robin Rodent. As Robin grew, she just couldn't understand why her community was so poor and hungry when some of the other mice in the district were plump and led a life of ease. On the day of her bat mitzvah, Robin declared that she would find a way to change the circumstances of her community.

Rabbi Tuckish, the community leader, was so inspired by the determined words of Robin that he decided to move the whole community to the Weekly Challah Food Bank, the supposed land of milk and honey. Imagine their horror when, one week after their move, they found out that the Weekly Challah Food Bank was also short of food. The mice felt completely defeated and lost until Robin Rodent came up with her plan.

Robin called together Rabbi Tuckish, Kleine Mouse, Maid Miriam and a close group of friends.

"Friends, I have an idea!" she said.

"Oy vey, Robin," said the rabbi. "We have no more strength for ideas."

"We have to listen to Robin, Rabbi. We have no other choices, no other opportunities," Kleine Mouse said.

"So what's the plan, Robin?" asked Maid Miriam.

Robin told them all about the fancy food store called Pushy Harry's. It was truly the land of milk and honey (and panini, focaccia, pasta and sun-dried tomatoes) and everything else. Robin decided to liberate food from Pushy Harry's and bring it back to the Weekly Challah Food Bank, not only benefiting the mice but also the food bank and all its customers.

Early the next morning, they snuck into the store and hid in the shelves of olives and hot banana peppers. They waited until nightfall and hearing Maid Miriam's truck pull up outside, loaded the good food into the back and made their getaway. Back at the Weekly Challah Food Bank, they quickly and stealthily stocked the shelves with the booty.

The raid proved so successful they decided that another one should be scheduled immediately. The same procedure was to be applied, but this time something went dreadfully wrong. A glass jar of hot banana peppers was pushed off the shelf onto the floor and broke with a loud crash. Pushy Harry himself came lumbering down the aisle and found Robin floundering in the spilled contents. He quickly grabbed a blue cappuccino bowl off the top shelf and clamped it down over poor Robin.

"Pushy Harry, Pushy Harry listen to me!" called Robin. "Take this bowl off me! I've got something to say to you."

"It must be the liver kreplach again," thought Harry. "This time, it's talking mice!"

"This is not liver kreplach. I am a talking mouse and my name is Robin Rodent," shouted Robin. "Now take this bowl off me!"

Pushy Harry was so astounded to find a talking mouse in his store that he obeyed Robin and removed the bowl.

"Pushy Harry, my group of mice live in a food bank and we're starving. Do you know what this means? Not only are we mice starving, but there's not enough food for the food bank's human customers either. Look around your store and recognize the bounty! Have you ever contributed to the Weekly Challah Food Bank?"

"No," said Pushy Harry, sheepishly.

"Harry, it is your responsibility and duty to help those who are not as fortunate as you. I think it's time for you to do a mitzvah," said Robin.

"What's that?" asked Harry.

"A mitzvah is a good deed, like helping an elderly mouse cross the street," said Robin. "If you do a mitzvah, it will make you feel good inside."

"Well, mouse, if it's as good as all that, I think that, well...I know! I'll contribute a good amount of my produce to the Weekly Challah Food Bank. Therefore, I can not only benefit myself by making myself feel good, but I also get to benefit two whole communities of mice and people. I already feel better."

P.S. The Weekly Challah Food bank prospered and soon became the Daily Bagel Food Bank, truly a mitzvah for our time.

U.S. officials taking aim at freezing Swiss assets

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Some American officials are talking about freezing Switzerland's assets in the United States — valued at about $86 billion — and seizing what is owed to the heirs of war-era Swiss bank accounts, a leading U.S. expert involved in the probe of wartime Swiss banks said here last week.

It wouldn't be easy, but some U.S. cities are floating the idea of freezing Swiss banking operations in their jurisdictions should Switzerland's offer to compensate Jews not materialize, said Gregg Rickman, project director of the U.S. Senate Banking Committee, which has been investigating the relationship between Swiss banks and Nazis during World War II.

Rickman, who works with committee chair, Senator Alfonse D'Amato, said the huge $4.7-billion compensation fund the Swiss have put forward is still "in question" because it hasn't been approved.

As well, a $185-million interim fund "is a mere pittance" compared with what the Swiss looted and stole from Jewish bank depositors during the war, Rickman told Update '97, an annual day-long seminar for lawyers, accountants and financial planners.

Freezing Swiss assets in the United States is a long shot, he said, but more and more officials are considering it as talks with the Swiss drag on.

Rickman issued a blistering denunciation of Switzerland's complicity with the Third Reich, saying wartime Swiss bankers "collaborated with the Nazis, lied and stole from Jews and extended the Holocaust."

Rickman and his team of researchers have unearthed "shocking" documents showing the Swiss were "the Nazis' bankers," laundering stolen money and even remelting looted gold into coins and backdating them in an effort to hide the deed.

Rickman said there were Swiss soldiers in the Nazi SS, Swiss rail lines that hooked up with German ones and even Swiss factories that manufactured ball bearings for the Nazi war effort.

After the war, Swiss officials helped spirit top Nazis to South America "at $50,000 a pop." In 1949, Swiss banks negotiated a deal with communist Poland, in which the banks would collect the assets of Polish nationals who never returned from the war. In 1950, a similar deal was reached with Hungary, he said.

For 50 years, Swiss officials "did everything they could to keep the money away" from its rightful heirs, Rickman said. "But they kept records, and that's what did them in."

The Swiss government has set up a historical commission, and an international team of auditors is going through the books. Rickman said he's "skeptical" the $4.7-billion compensation fund will be approved, and besides, it has "a catch" — half the interest it will generate will have to be spent in Switzerland.

"The Swiss have perpetrated a great evil," said Rickman. "They have been arrogant and they tried to get away with a great crime. They should be punished."

Update '97 was presented by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Endowment Fund. It was announced at the conference that Barry Sherman, chair of Apotex, recently made a $25 million gift to the fund, whose goal is $150 million over five years.

Mezuzahs help raise funds

TORONTO — Students at Jewish schools and clients of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care have been busy for months painting ceramic mezuzot for the hundreds of doorways in Baycrest's new Apotex Centre/Jewish Home for the Aged and the Centre for Cognitive Disorders, scheduled to begin construction this spring.

The effort is part of the Baycrest Mezuzah Project, an initiative of the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary to raise funds for the planned expansion.

The project is one of several initiatives organized in support of the Baycrest Foundation's Imagine Your Future Without It campaign to raise $60 million to build the new centre.

The complex will care for 472 physically and cognitively frail residents in an atmosphere which is designed to be warm and home-like. The resident floors will be organized into small units for 13 to 14 people, each with its own living room, dining room and shared kitchenette, and will be decorated to reflect Jewish heritage and the individual preferences of residents

IRB to consult members on Jewish refugees

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) will soon begin consulting its 170 members about how to handle Jewish refugee claimants.

If no immediate consensus emerges, guidelines will be written on how to process refugee claims from Jews, John Frecker, deputy chair of the IRB, told The CJN in a phone interview last week.

Frecker said the board will start "canvassing" members "to get what their sense is" on the issue. The move was triggered by two contradictory court decisions on Jewish refugee claimants to Canada.

Two years ago, the Federal Court of Canada upheld an IRB panel's denial of refugee status to a Jewish woman. The court agreed with the panel that because the claimant was Jewish, she was eligible for immediate citizenship in Israel under that country's Law of Return.

The judgment stated that Antonina Grygorian had "ready and automatic right to another country's nationality," and that Canada's protection "is not a quick fix."

The decision outraged Jewish communal officials, who feared it would lead to a modern-day closed-door Canadian refugee policy aimed specifically at Jews.

But last month, the Federal Court arrived at an opposite view. It found that Jewish refugee claimants cannot be denied asylum in Canada solely because, as Jews, they can go to Israel (CJN, May 22).

Even though the Law of Return gives every Jew the right to Israeli citizenship, with few exceptions, a clearly expressed desire to settle in the Jewish state is first required, the court said.

The landmark ruling overturned a decision by the IRB, which denied refugee status to a Ukrainian Jewish woman on the grounds that she could automatically receive asylum in Israel.

Over the past two years, the Grygorian decision has divided the IRB on how to deal with Jewish refugee claimants. There have been many rulings granting refugee status to Jewish claimants, but some panels, as community officials had feared, have relied on the tenets set out in the Grygorian case.

Last month's ruling stated clearly that the Grygorian decision is not binding on IRB panels.

Frecker said the two rulings have created a situation at the IRB that is "not satisfactory."

He said the consultative process, which could take six weeks, will ask IRB members what their views are, given the second court ruling.

He said if all members agree one way or the other, then "this could become a non-issue. But my guess is that the Grygorian proponents will have strong views.

"There probably will be internal division on this."

If that's the case, IRB lawyers will begin drafting guidelines. Frecker said it's possible the board will consult outside experts.

Baycrest resident celebrates her 100th birthday

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One hundred years ago, Wilfred Laurier was prime minister of Canada, William McKinley was president of the United States and Ida Rosenberg Ashrow was born in New York City.

Ashrow, now a resident of the Baycrest Hospital, recently celebrated her birthday with a party at the Thornhill home of her daughter, Joyce Sniderman. Over 100 people attended, including her three grandchildren and two great-grandchildren.

Ashrow grew up in Montreal, where she went to school, winning two medals, which enabled her to further her education. When she moved to Toronto, she met her husband, Jack, who died recently after over 70 years of marriage.

Ashrow worked as a bookkeeper until she was 85 and then began a new career as a volunteer. She served on many committees at Baycrest Terrace, when she lived there, and continued at the Home for the Aged. She volunteered for United Jewish Appeal and United Way.

Although she is in fragile health, daughter Joyce Sniderman describes her mother as "amazing — and completely articulate."

Sniderman said that her mother attributes her long life to the fact that she never whined or complained, but accepted what life brought her.

Abuse of women must not be ignored: Dratch

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — We mustn't let shame silence us about the fact that there are abused women in the Jewish community, says the supervisor of the women abuse program at Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

"It is a shandeh to deny that the problem is ours. Women abuse is not a cheery topic, but the reality is that 300 women each year seek our services because of it," said Gail Gould.

She was one of three speakers at the recent Jewish Women's Federation and UJA Federation Women's Campaign panel, Sounds of Silence: Issues of Woman Abuse in the Jewish Family. Other panel members included Rabbi Mark Dratch, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, and Marsha Sfeir, coordinator of Public Education and Training Education, Wife Assault. Moderator was Jane Hawtin, host/producer of Jane Hawtin Live.

Rabbi Dratch, who said he was "embarrassed" that so few men were in the capacity crowd at Shaarei Shomayim, said that although there are resources within the Jewish tradition to deal with wife abuse, "we don't [address it] because we don't want to bring ill repute to our community.

"This view, however, is topsy-turvy. If we have violence in the community it is bad enough, but to deny it is even worse. It is a desecration of G-d's name. Lashon hora is a serious issue, but speaking out about domestic violence is not lashon hora. If someone is in trouble, we are obligated to speak out. If we remain silent, we are responsible for spilling their blood."

There are too many horror stories, he said, about rabbis who send abused women home again [because of shalom bayit]. "Keep going from one rabbi to the next until you find one that who will be your advocate. It is too easy to fall through the cracks and become a victim.

"We need to sensitize the community and rabbis that the words shalom bayit are not magic words that make everything better. None of the principles of law, truth or peace are absolute. Shalom must be tempered with truth and justice. Where there is not justice, there is no peace."

Gould said that too many women think peace must be obtained at any price. "Shalom bayit is real peace, not a cover up."

She described the "house of abuse" as having nine rooms. "In the religious room, the man uses Halachah to control his partner and speaks to her about shalom bayit. In the child abuse room, we see that children can be the victims of child abuse or neglect — 80 percent of children of abused mothers hear them being abused."

She also talked about the social isolation room, the room of emotional and psychological abuse, the financial control room (even when women earn their own money), the room of intimidation, the physical room, the sexual room and the verbal abuse room.

"Right here in the Jewish community, we have experienced violence in our own homes. There is no segment immune from the issue."

Citing statistics, Sfeir said that 51 percent of all women over 16 have been involved in at least one incident of violence and 73 percent of high school students in Toronto and London report knowing about date violence. "One in nine report physical abuse and one in five report sexual abuse, and jealousy is the most frequent trigger."

Public awareness campaign

Many programs are being run across the province, she said, to teach prevention strategies. "What these programs do, is strive to enhance children's self-esteem and to label their feelings. They need assertiveness training, they need to learn self-control and they need a conflict mediation program. Values education promotes the universal values of caring, trust, equality and respect for diversity."

Asked about signs that could indicate a man might be abusive, Gould said to be aware of men who are overly critical, of those who degrade or humiliate women or those who try to dominate a relationship by making all the decisions. "At JF&CS we have information for women that could help them identify potentially abusive behavior."

Last week in Israel, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu launched a public awareness campaign against domestic violence, saying that the only difference between the battle against family violence and terror is that the former is hidden and fought within the home.

Netanyahu said the only way to fight violence in the family is for the victim to decide to stop being one. He called on women to take their fate into their own hands and seek help.

Some 200,000 Israeli women, or one out of seven, are physically abused, but only 18,000 complaints are filed with police each year, according to government statistics.

The campaign will include televised public service messages, with a hotline number for women seeking help.

"It is hard to give exact figures, because much domestic violence is hidden," said Ronit Lev Ari, head of the department against family violence in the women's organization Na'amat.

Lev Ari said the first step was to build awareness, and then government ministries, police and the legal system would work together to stop offenders.

Only 30 years ago

It was only 30 years ago. In three bombast-filled weeks, Gamal Abdel Nasser's hateful rhetoric evolved into a military gambit to strangle and then crush the 19-year-old Jewish state. The Western world, if not silent, was passive. Twice within the same generation, Jewish survival hung heavily in the air, like a teardrop ready to fall. The Jewish world held its breath.

Then, out of the blinding sun in the early morning of June 5, the Israel Defence Forces struck. For six day, battles raged.

Israel vanquished its enemies.

It was a victory of 2.5 million against 50 million. More than a military victory, however, it was a victory of one set of values against another, of democracy against despotism, of the cause of justice against the cause of hatred, of the determination to live against the desire to destroy.

The teardrop did fall 30 years ago in the Jewish world. But it was a tear of joy, a tear of gratitude and of understanding that the brilliant white glow of Israel's incandescence was something metaphysical, beyond history, and a light which shone on us all.

Medieval and menacing

Last week, the Montreal daily La Presse carried a story about the arrest of a gang of criminals by the RCMP. Given the nature and pace of life in our large cities, it was, more or less, a welcome but "routine" intervention by law enforcement officers into the netherworld of drug-running criminals and drug-related-crime. But there was nothing routine about the manner in which La Presse chose to write the story.

In an eerie echo of the menacing group libels of medieval times, the newspaper portrayed the thugs as a "Jewish criminal organization." And, in an added effort to lend credibility to its outrageous approach to the story and to its preposterous emphasis on the religion of the seven Jews among the 31 people arrested, the newspaper also printed a sidebar about Meyer Lansky and Bugsy Siegel, two notorious Jewish gangsters who plied their illegal trade half a century ago.

In response to the indignation expressed to his newspaper by Jewish community leaders, Claude Masson, the assistant publisher of La Presse was reported to have answered, in part, "I think we should be careful about being so politically correct that we can no longer say what is happening in our society."

That Masson appears to view the matter as merely one of political correctness is as distressing as it is alarming. It is distressing because it fosters absurd stereotypes, helps justify malicious prejudices and encourages bigots to hold onto their bigotry. It is alarming because he genuinely seems not to understand this; he seems genuinely not to understand that the religion of the alleged criminals is a total and utter irrelevancy to the alleged nature of their criminal acts.

The reportage of this story by La Presse brings readers more news about La Presse than it does about the efforts by the RCMP to staunch crime on our streets.

Orthodox position on conversions

The recent letter by Bert Raphael continues to spread the misinformation that Orthodox Judaism has somehow written off Jews who follow Conservative and Reform Judaism.

It has been stated over and over again: A Jew born of a Jewish woman is and will always remain Jewish, regardless of what stream of Judaism, if any, they follow. The controversy concerns Conservative and Reform philosophy and theology. Are they to be considered within the parameters of an authentic Jewish tradition as revealed at Mt. Sinai, or not?

The tone of Raphael's letter was full of venom and certainly did not enhance the spirit of "unity."

What surprises me even more, is that The CJN, a communal Jewish weekly newspaper, surely interested in building bridges, would print such a vicious diatribe that only serves to deepen the rift amongst Jews.

Ashkenazim should end divisions

As much as we admire our Ashkenazi brothers and sisters for their contribution in the advancement of humanity in world science, literature, music, philosophy, for your organizational skills, your unquestionable sense of communal solidarity, we Sephardim are puzzled by your low level of religious unity in practice and faith.

If you advocate unity between our French and English Canadian fellow citizens, as it should be, couldn't you find a religious common ground for people who are of the same origin and refer to the same Torah and the same G-d. Unless you want to emulate Christians who are divided among Orthodox, Catholic, Protestant and all their sects. Or Muslims who count Shiites and Sunnis in their ranks; or Asians who differ from Shintoism to Buddhism to Confucianism. Show the way, be united!

Action by Switzerland too late

The special fund launched by the Swiss banks and government to recant on their past history and former assertions will never erase the damage caused by the authorities in those years. The joint commission of the Swiss Bankers Association, the World Jewish Congress and other agencies is facing a complex assignment which can take several years. Let us hope that the aid to the Holocaust survivors will become a prompt reality.

Observant and non-observant men cause problem

Prof. David Novak contends (CJN, May 1) that the agunah problem "mainly affects religious women. Non-observant husbands can usually be persuaded. The worst offenders are [usually] religiously observant Jews."

One would assume that Novak has researched carefully and extensively the agunah problem, locally, nationally and internationally, and is able to produce accurate statistical data to support his contentions. Anything less would make him guilty of stereotyping and maligning the religiously observant community.

My own experience suggests that there is no basis whatsoever for the learned professor's contentions. In fact, it is often precisely many non-observant Jewish men who are the least likely to accede to community persuasion to consent to a get.

Erase the blot on Canada's good name

The parodies of justice started by the crystal ball-gazing Mackenzie King persist to this very day where Nazi war criminals are concerned.

This country doesn't have to carry a blot on its image as a haven for Nazi murderers. It is high time for the government to show some guts, and strength to be rid of the cowardly Nazi rabble of other countries living here.

Jerusalem reunited, 30 years ago

Images that last...

This photo montage attempts to record for the reader some of the ethereal moments recorded forever into the history of mankind when the IDF recaptured the Old City of Jerusalem 30 years ago, the 28th day of Iyar 5727, June 7, 1967.

Reading clockwise: IDF commanders entering the Old City, Gen. Uzi Narkiss (left), commanding officer, central command, Gen. Moshe Dayan, minister of defence, Gen. Yitzhak Rabin, commander in chief; Paratroops storm the walls of Jerusalem, IDF chief rabbi, Gen. Shlomo Goren, a sefer Torah on his shoulders, is with them; Troops advancing through the alleys of the Old City; Three weeks after Jerusalem was recaptured, Rabin received an honorary doctorate on behalf of the IDF from the Hebrew University in a ceremony on Mount Scopus, the site of the original university that was cut off by the Jordanians in 1948; The president of the State of Israel, Zalman Shazar at the Wall; Units of the IDF enter the Zion Gate on their way to a victory review on the Temple Mount; An emotion-filled celebration as soldiers begin to arrive at the Wall; Narkiss (left) and Col. Opinions

Labor party passes the torch

As this column goes to print, the Labor party in Israel is electing its new leader. I'm not risking much by predicting a victory for Ehud Barak, who is by far the leading contender. But the four-man race has had its surprises, not least of which is the quality of all four candidates.

By Shira Herzog in Toronto

Barak, who will run as Labor's candidate for prime minister in the next election, was parachuted into the Rabin cabinet in the summer of 1995, one year after he left the position of chief of staff of the IDF. It was clear already then that Barak would be a contender for the top slot in 2000 and that he would be supported by Rabin.

Barak is a calculating strategist, whose world view was shaped by decades at the helm of elite fighting units, and who carries with him the aura that military leaders still enjoy in Israel. His performance as a politician over the last two years has received mixed reviews. During and after the failed Labor campaign in the 1996 election, Barak pushed, unsuccessfully, for a harder, more critical line against Netanyahu — contrary to the approach taken by Haim Ramon, who led the campaign team. Barak is viewed as winning material by many members of the Labor party, but he is not necessarily the candidate they like the best or trust the most.

Barak's antithesis and passionate opponent is Yossi Beilin. One of Shimon Peres' closest confidants for two decades, Beilin's reputation has been built on his strength as an astute, shrewd politician who has often been ahead of his time in his proclamations on foreign and domestic issues. He has been relentless in his pursuit of an agenda for peace between Israel and its neighbors, and was one of the architects of the Oslo accord with the PLO.

A cerebral intellectual, who is as comfortable in academe as in the toughest political arena, Beilin has been passionate in his vision of the challenges facing Israel as a state no longer at war. He has said that he decided to run against Barak to provide a serious, clear alternative and to ensure a substantive debate on the issues.

Efraim Sneh, a former senior IDF commander and cabinet minister, was actually the first to toss his hat into the ring after the party's defeat in the last election. Sneh enjoys enormous popularity in the party rank and file, and positions himself as a "centrist" on security and social policy issues. The prevailing wisdom is that he is running to secure his position in the next Labor cabinet, rather than due to any real differences in outlook with Barak. He is perceived as a man of integrity and experience, but he lacks the charisma and telegenic qualities that are requisite for today's political leaders.

The surprise of the race has been Shlomo Ben-Ami, the articulate historian and former Israeli ambassador to Spain. Ben-Ami, who was first elected to the Knesset in 1996, has emerged as the party's social conscience and as an authentic voice calling for change in the way that Labor relates to the diversity of the Israeli polity.

As a childhood immigrant from Morocco, Ben-Ami speaks passionately of the need to develop a new dialogue among Israelis, and a new social agenda, without which Labor will not be able to break the existing coalition of Likud, Israelis of Middle Eastern origin and religious parties.

All four men are serious, experienced individuals and together they present a formidable combination of backgrounds and achievements. Their race has been held in the shadow of the failed efforts, by outgoing leader Peres, to secure himself a seat of continuing influence in the party. Barak, who opposed any attempt to have two foci of power at the helm, outmanoeuvred Peres in a move that many view as a portent of the blunt style they fear for the future.

For the Labor party, this election of a new leader marks the passing of the torch to the generation that was born into the state. In Likud, this happened with the election of Benjamin Netanyahu as leader, while in Labor, Barak will be the first leader who is not of the "founding fathers."

Both large parties, and most of the smaller ones, are now led by a younger cadre of leaders. Some would say that they are the right breed to lead the country into the 21st century. Others bemoan the loss of a sense of history and vision that marked the older generation. The kings are gone…long live the kings…

Religious faith and politics

What relation, if any, should there be between a politician's personal religious commitments and his or her suitability for holding office?

By Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

In an interview with the Globe and Mail's Jan Wong (May 22), Reform party chief Preston Manning reportedly made some interesting and perhaps unguarded comments. For me — a liberal democrat and a Jew — they proved troublesome on two counts.

First, the quotes. Manning was asked to comment on his own religious faith — a fundamentalist or evangelical brand of Christianity.

Manning indicated that he feels that all the other great religions are in error, and that Christianity holds a monopoly on religious truth: "I would like the different religions to sit down and attempt to find out the objective truth. We can't both be right. In the area of the spiritual, there are absolutes, too."

A second quote suggested somewhat awkwardly that his personal relations with the unchurched are motivated in large part by a desire to steer them onto his correct path: "The great hope is that people I meet, if we get to know each other well enough, I could tell you how to enter into it." This is a clear missionary reflex.

The first reason these remarks were troubling was their possible implications for non-Christian Canadians. The Reform party has been dogged throughout its history by allegations of racism and intolerance. The one constant has been the public pronouncements by Manning — whose father Ernest had played a role in reducing the presence of anti-Semites in the Alberta Social Credit party — condemning those expressions of intolerance. Manning sought to position himself as a populist, but not as a "red-neck."

I had often tended to give Manning himself the benefit of any doubt. But these comments suggest that Manning's own commitment to religious tolerance might not be as deep as I had hoped. The undertone of anti-French sentiment in the recent campaign adds to this suspicion. The spectre of a Canadian version of Pat Robertson, the fundamentalist candidate for the Republican party, might not seem as far-fetched. How sympathetic would a Manning government be to a variety of human rights concerns, including those specific to the Canadian Jewish community? Fundamentalism of any stripe might undermine minority protections.

The second reason for my concern was the inverse of the first! Was I displaying an unfair distrust of any deeply religious politician? Was I simply prejudiced against such views, finding them outmoded and illiberal, or just out of place in the Canadian political arena?

I also may have feared that Manning would be unable to separate his personal religious convictions from the public requirements of his office. Just such prejudices had long harmed Catholic politicians in North America, dating back to Democratic presidential nominee Al Smith in 1928. It was felt that Catholic politicians might be more loyal to the Vatican than to their country. And how would they decide today on the abortion issue if the law and their religious convictions clashed? Needless to say, these variants of the charge of dual loyalty continue to plague Jewish politicians, when loyalties to Israel or to "Jewish interests" are suspect.

True religious freedom means that no one should be penalized from holding public office by dint of their personal religious convictions, by the law or by societal prejudice. We do not have a truly religiously neutral public space; Christmas and Easter, not Chanukah and Pesach, are national holidays. This is a minimal intrusion of religion.

But there is also nothing wrong with political leaders claiming to be guided by religious values. American civil rights leaders were animated by their religious beliefs. Legal scholar Stephen Carter's The Culture of Disbelief argues that a misreading of "separation of church and state" has trivialized the role of faith in American public life.

Obviously one has to be cautious. Orthodox Jews would generally not espouse the doctrine of sole objective truth, à la Manning. (The seven laws of Noah represent a set of mainly person to person laws which, if followed by non-Jews, would qualify them as deserving a place in the hereafter. Non-Jews can be saved.) Yet as recent struggles in Israel have shown, issues of religious and secular intolerance have infected the religious and political scene there.

So how should Canadian Jews react to comments such as Manning's? They suggest a high degree of vigilance, lest these private religious convictions edge into public positions regarding minorities and human rights. Manning's public views are, so far, a far cry from those of American Patrick Buchanan. It will be up to Manning to see that the difference persists. The jury is out.

Two Jews made a difference

It was 61 years ago that Adolf Hitler received his first public setback. The Olympic Games were taking place in Berlin, and the Fuehrer had come to watch highly touted athletes win prestigious events like the 100-metre dash. However, it was a black man from the United States, the incomparable Jesse Owens, who ran away with the trophies. The Fuehrer refused to shake hands with him and left the stadium in disgust. History has remembered Owens as the symbolic victor over racial prejudice and, eventually, over the Third Reich. Today there is, in Berlin, a Jesse Owens Boulevard.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Near it runs a street that until recently was called National Sports Road (Reichssportfeldstrasse), and it has become the subject of a controversy over two Jewish athletes.

Their names were Gustav Felix Flatow and Alfred Flatow and they participated in the first Olympic Games ever held. They went to Athens in 1896 and came away with laurel wreaths (Olympic medals were awarded later on). At the time, they gained the status of heroes in Germany.

To the Nazis, of course, they were not heroes, but merely despised Jews. In 1942, both of them were transported to Terezin, where Alfred, 73 years old, died of hunger and Gustav suffered the same fate several years later.

For several years, a drive was underway to honor these two Olympians in some fashion, and a suggestion was made to rename the National Sports Road and call it Flatow Boulevard. But more than half the inhabitants of the street opposed the name change and the matter dragged on for some years.

Recently, however, the plan has succeeded and the change has become final. Now the Jewish heroes of 1896 have a street named after them, which runs next to the boulevard that bears the name of a black man who gained victories 40 years later. Together they form a memorial, not merely to athletic excellence, but to the renascence of decency and fairness.

Gustav Flatow's son Stefan survived Terezin. He is now 80 years old and was interviewed by the Berlin Rundschau. When asked what he felt when he saw the new street signs go up, he said: "I remember how my dad, who once was an enormously strong athlete and Olympic victor, died of hunger within four weeks after reaching Terezin. He weighed only 40 pounds when he breathed his last breath. Yes, there were those who opposed the new name, but there was an enormous outpouring of sympathy that came my way, which made me very happy."

The street which now bears the name of Flatow will hopefully contribute something to the re-evaluation of history and the self-confrontation of Germans — even those who opposed the change of name.

Parliamentary commission probes Switzerland's past

Jacques Picard feels the weight of the burden. "It is a big responsibility," he said, referring to his membership in a nine-

By Sheldon Kirshner

man Swiss parliamentary historical commission charged with investigating Switzerland's ambivalent role during and after World War II.

For about the past two years, Switzerland — an Alpine country of stunning beauty commonly associated with chic ski resorts, fine watches and tantalizing chocolates — has been at the centre of an increasingly bitter international controversy concerning its past.

Swiss banks have been charged with pocketing the funds of Jewish account holders who perished in the Holocaust. Switzerland's national bank has been accused of trafficking in looted Nazi gold. Swiss industry has been censured for having sold Germany munitions and weaponry and thus prolonging the war. The Swiss government has been taken to task for having turned away thousands of Jewish refugees and thereby consigning them to certain death. In short, Switzerland's morality and neutrality have been severely questioned.

This catalogue of accusations, which has tarnished Switzerland's image, prompted the Swiss parliament last December to establish a historical commission. Its mandate is to study all aspects of Switzerland's policy during that time frame.

The commission, which is headed by Swiss historian Jean-Francois Bergier and includes four non-Swiss members, has an unlimited budget and has been given five years to produce a final report.

To facilitate its work, parliament took the unprecedented step of lifting Swiss banking secrecy laws. "We have been given full access to public and private company archives," said Picard, a 44 year-old Jewish historian who is coordinating the entire effort. He was born in the Swiss city of Basel and his book, Switzerland and the Jews, caused a national sensation when it was published in German in 1994. "Everything is open to us. In this respect, we have more power than the courts."

Picard, whom I interviewed on an express train bound from Bern to Basel, was asked to join the commission on the strength of Switzerland and the Jews, which has yet to be translated into English.

Factual rather than moralistic, the volume precipitated a nationwide debate and was probably influential in persuading Kaspar Villiger, the Swiss president in 1995, to issue an official apology regarding Switzerland's treatment of Jewish refugees.

According to Picard, a historian at the Biel College of Technology, Switzerland compiled a mixed record on this question. Thirty thousand Jewish refugees were admitted, but an equal number were cast aside.

A graduate of the University of Freibourg and Bern University, Picard doesn't buy the mythology that the army alone defended Switzerland's neutrality.

Hemmed in by Germany and Italy, the two major Axis powers, Switzerland was able to preserve its neutral status not only because of its vaunted armed forces. Switzerland was useful to Germany because it was a financial and intelligence-gathering centre. It represented the interests of 10 Allied states in Berlin as the war raged. It allowed the passage of German trains to Italy via its mountain passes. It exported a variety of dual-use civilian and military equipment to Germany. In Picard's view, Switzerland profited handsomely from this trade.

Neutrality defended by various means

Suggesting that Switzerland was opportunistic in its foreign policy, Picard said it tilted toward Germany when it was strong and toward the Allies when they were on the ascendancy.

As for public opinion, he believes that the average Swiss was anti-Nazi but not necessarily pro-Jewish.

In his opinion, Switzerland has begun to face its past, but "still has a long way to go."

To some degree, Francois Loeb, the only Jewish member of the federal parliament in Bern, is in accord with Picard.

For too long, he said, Switzerland was too smug about its wartime role. In the last few years, however, the Swiss have come to appreciate that some of the decisions made during that period "were clearly wrong and conflicted with Switzerland's humanitarian tradition."

A middle-of-the-road politician whose family owns a department store chain, Loeb advocates a balanced approach. True, Switzerland refused to admit Jewish refugees, and true, a Swiss official, Heinrich Rothmund, convinced Germany to stamp a "J" into the passports of German and Austrian Jews so that they could be stopped at the border.

But by the same token, Paul Gruninger, the police chief of St. Gallen, let in 3,600 Austrian Jews by issuing them forged documents, while Carl Lutz, the Swiss consul in Budapest, saved thousands of Hungarian Jews. Loeb neglected to mention that Gruninger's courage cost him his job as well as his pension.

Loeb is clearly uncomfortable with the fact that Swiss weaponry flowed into Germany. But he claims that Switzerland had no alternative but to supply the Germans, and points out that the Allies also bought Swiss material, most notably optical equipment for their aircraft.

Few countries, he noted, emerged from the war with "clean hands." The Allies did not bomb the rail lines to Auschwitz, and Allied powers, including Canada, were reluctant to accept Jewish refugees. (To take his argument one step further, one should point out that Canada admitted fewer Jewish refugees than Switzerland.)

As for the post-war era, Loeb is certain that Swiss banks should have been more forthcoming and less legalistic in their handling of Jewish dormant accounts.

Ulrich Schluer, a right-wing parliamentarian from the village of Flaach, near the German border, heatedly denies that Swiss neutrality was profit-oriented.

"Switzerland wanted to keep its independence and to do this it had to ensure people had jobs and food. Certainly, there were Swiss people who had ulterior motives. But it was a question of survival."

Until 1940, Swiss feared Nazi invasion

Being surrounded by a ring of fascist countries, and being a small state, Switzerland had no choice but to trade with Germany, Schluer said. And until about 1940, Switzerland was in danger of being invaded by Germany, which had drawn up a plan (Operation Tannenbaum) for that very purpose.

Describing the plight of Jewish refugees as "a very tragic part of Swiss and European history," Schluer rejects the assumption that Switzerland's policy was grounded in anti-Semitism. "Swiss people... wanted to do the best for their country, and this is not anti-Semitism."

In Bern, the capital, I discussed these issues with a senior Swiss diplomat who prefers to remain anonymous. He made two points:

Swiss banks, in the aftermath of the war, should have liquidated their German assets, including their holdings in Nazi-plundered gold. The Swiss government was insufficiently sensitive to the moral dimension of its neutrality.

"But now," he said, "we should clarify our history. We haven't done enough to shed light on our past. We're serious about establishing the historical truth."

As part of this process, he concluded, Switzerland should go ahead with a previously announced plan to set up a $4.7 billion (US) foundation to assist victims of poverty, oppression and genocide. But it may well be defeated in a referendum. "Right now," he said glumly, " the mood in the country is negative."

Contrary

to popular belief, there doesn't have to be a death in the family to start planning a funeral.

Funeral pre-arrangement is a sensible way to plan for tomorrow, while putting your mind at ease today. And arrangements can be as affordable as they are practical.

We can spare your family the burden of taking care of things when they need to take care of themselves, at a time of intense emotional stress.

Call one of our Funeral Directors to discuss funeral pre-arrangement ... and get on with your life.

Study of Torah nurtures the soul

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

Shavuot is the holiday when the Jewish people formally became a nation by accepting the Ten Commandments and the Torah at Mt. Sinai. Yet unlike other biblical holidays the actual date, the 6th of Sivan, is not recorded in the Torah.

This is to remind every single Jew, old and young, that the words of the Torah must be studied and observed throughout the entire year. Every time we open the Ark to replace the Torah, we sing and/or recite the words, "It is the Tree of Life." Indeed the proper observance and understanding of the Torah and its teachings nurtures the soul and guides our physical, social and family activities.

Shavuot is celebrated at the end of the Sephira, 16 days after Lag b'Omer, which commemorates a period of time in Jewish history when the Roman authorities forbade the study of Torah and the observances of its major mitzvot. Today we are living in a time when throughout the world, even in formerly Communist Russia, Jews are free to study, examine and fulfil the mitzvot relating to the Almighty and to fellow human beings. At the same time, this freedom has brought with it serious challenges that have to be met.

On one hand there has been a happy explosion of thousands of young people and adults now engaged in Jewish studies in larger number than even before World War II in Eastern Europe. Unfortunately, there are too many Jews who do not see the Torah or Jewish studies as very important in their lives.

This same concern was expressed in a recent article in the Jewish Week by Prof. Samuel Heilman where he compares the paradoxical Jewish experiences in America by quoting the classic famous opening lines of Dickens in his novel A Tale of Two Cities: "It was the best of times, it was the worst of times..."

Unlike the early immigration period it is no longer hard to be a Jew in America. We have no problem building synagogues, even filling them at many milestones in the calendar year. There are more day schools than ever before. There are a tremendous number of scholarships and serious students in the yeshivot as well as in Jewish programs in more than 300 universities in North America. No one would have thought this possible 50 years ago. If this is so, why do we have legitimate concerns about the state of North American Jewry as we approach the 21st century?

At a time when most American Jews have received a good secular education, the majority of them do not open up a Jewish book or spend any time studying their Jewish heritage. In the prayers and the kiddush, we call Shavuot Zman Matan Toratenu, which means a time when we receive the gift of Torah. This gift is the glorious inheritance that must be passed down from one generation to another.

The word zman (time) is a significant and key word in the perpetuation of proper Jewish life for all members of the Jewish family. When children are young, their parents find time for them to go to day or Hebrew school, either because they are committed Jews or want to celebrate the bar or bat mitzvah with their children.

Why is it that after this milestone, so many Jewish teenagers — with their parents' consent — suddenly cannot find any time to participate in formal and informal Jewish programs of study and related activities.

Today there is the Internet, computers and records, so that adults and even young people attending colleges or universities can be involved in Jewish learning. Regrettably the vast majority of students attending universities do not participate in any kind of Jewish programming, there or elsewhere.

May the coming holiday of Shavuot serve as a reminder to all members of the family to make it Zman Matan Toratenu.

Good can flourish within depths of evil

By RACHEL TURKIENICZ

The holiday of Shavuot brings to mind the Book of Ruth and its wonderful story of bonding and Jewish affiliation. The book ends with a projection of Ruth's descendants, culminating in the birth of David the future king.

Ultimately, the Messiah will issue from the Davidic line and thus Ruth is the ancestral beginning of our final redemption.

There is an obscure aspect of Ruth's lineage that deserves attention. Ruth begins her life as a Moabite woman. She is from the people of Moab and is referred to as such even after her conversion to Judaism. It is this Moabite connection which is often ignored. Who are the Moabites and how did they produce the woman who will give us our Messiah?

The Bible traces the Moabite nation to the biblical figures of Lot and his daughters. The story plays out in the city of Sodom, the epitome of evil in that generation. Sodom is destroyed by G-d with a hailstorm of fire and in the final sequence of events, only Lot and two of his daughters survive. The daughters believe that their father is the only living male in the world and they worry that humankind will end. One can understand their concern, since only 10 generations previously, the entire world was destroyed by a flood and only Noah and his family survived.

Therefore, with the best of intentions, these women intoxicate their father and each of them lies incestuously with Lot. Both women are impregnated by their father and both women give birth to sons. It is one of these sons that fathers the entire Moabite nation. The premeditated act executed by these women would clearly be defined as rape in today's world. The intoxication was deliberate with a stated sexual intent.

There is an interesting balance struck in the story between the first and last times we meet these women. The Bible first mentions Lot's daughters when an angry mob of Sodomites threatens to storm the house and molest G-d's messengers. Lot offers his two daughters to the mob to do with them as they choose. Lot ultimately becomes the victim of the very same crime for which he had offered his daughters. And yet, these women are not punished for their deed — the commentaries tell us that their intention was so good as to mitigate their actions.

The conflict between intention and action which arises with Lot's daughters is resolved in the person of Ruth. Ruth's actions are the fulfilment of her intentions and it is this union that can produce the Messiah.

At the holiday of Shavuot when we celebrate our receiving the Torah at Mount Sinai, there is an important irony. We travel backward from our future final redemption, through our history to King David, back to Ruth, back to Moab, back to Lot.

Ruth and her foreign matriarchs teach us of the possibilities that can arise even from within the depths of evil. The midrash states that "G-d said to Abraham: I have searched the world entire and have finally found the seeds of redemption — they are planted in Sodom."

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Why Judaism matters

By DR. ELLIOTT MALAMET

I run a prayer service on Shabbat morning, and not long ago one of the congregants said to me with great urgency: "Dr. Malamet, one of my closest friends is an atheist. She is healthy, has a nice house, a wonderful husband, beautiful kids. I have a hard time telling her why religion should matter to her. What does a person like that really need God for?"

Over the years I have been asked this question may times in one form or another. It is the key religious question, I think, of contemporary life. For a great many people, the issue is not whether one religion is right and the other wrong, but rather, why should I really care about any of this? Why should a spiritual life play a role in my structured and secularized life of work and family and entertainment? So I will tell you what I told my congregant over the course of several weeks.

Judaism is not just a substitute for other things. If you want to get your emotional problems worked through, then in all likelihood a skilled psychotherapist can help. One doesn't need religion for this. As an institution to promote social change? There are lots of secular institutions that can promote and work for good causes. One doesn't need to be connected to a synagogue or church to protest in the streets or sign a petition. No, the reason religion becomes important is because of the human need for transcendence, for a higher dimension to reality. Without God and the spiritual life we are diminished human beings. We are less.

But we are utterly uneducated about this side of life. Many of us had a brief religious education, but often found it alienating, or worse, oppressive. So at the ripe old age of 13 or 14 — perhaps a bit later, perhaps earlier — many people abandoned or rejected the place of God/ religion/prayer in their lives. Spurred by distasteful memories of synagogue or Hebrew school, we decided that the spiritual life was last in line behind sports, movies, music and sex, and later on, marriage and work. What an age to make such a momentous choice!

And the fallout from this is that we become expert in many areas of life — everything from computers to RRSPs to global warming to how to write a business letter to how to plan your diet — but we are not taught to consider one basic question: What does life mean? Why, after perhaps reaching my stated goals, am I still left with a certain restlessness, as though something is still not falling into place?

When you think about it, satisfying answers to these questions are hard to pin down. But it is a Jewish educator's business to talk to young people about precisely these matters. It is not enough for a student to find out about what we do on Pesach or learn how to daven or master a passage of Talmud. There are machines that can tutor you in how to read, how to write, how to study. But only a human being can teach how to think about life.

The time has come for teachers to lay it on the line with our children and show them why Judaism is not just a "lifestyle" — it is life. If we look up at the end of the year and realize that it's been an exercise in information stuffing, if we don't go beyond the text as teachers, if we don't struggle with our students on the questions that really matter, then we have no business being in the classroom.

Studying Torah all year

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On Tuesday night we celebrate Shavuot, and recall G-d's giving of the Torah to the Jewish people at Mt. Sinai. [http://www.maven.co.il/subjects/shavuot.htm] So what better time to resolve to learn more about the book central to Jewish life? If you'd like to continue to study Torah year round but can't attend a regular class, you can still be part of a virtual one — on the Jewish Highway.

There are dozens of online commentaries available on parshat hashavuah — the weekly Torah portion — from almost every perspective imaginable.

From A Byte of Torah, The Electronic Torah Weekly [http://ifrit.web.aol.com/mld/production/yiabmove.html], to Torah Hayim — Living Torah Study for Reform Jews [http://shamash.org/reform/uahc/torah/tindex.html] to the writings of Dr. Ismar Schorsch, Chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America, [http://www.jtsa.edu/pubs/parashah/index.html] to the Virtual Beit Hamidrash [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/yhe/]. And if you'd like to do your learning in Hebrew (and you have Hebrew fonts installed), then try out Bar-Ilan University's Parshat Hashavua Page [http://www.biu.ac.il:80/JH/Parasha/]. Bar Ilan also maintains an English site at [http://www.biu.ac.il:80/JH/Eparasha/].

There are two different ways to receive information. You can either visit a Web site on a regular basis to check out that week's material [http://www.shamash.org/tanach/dvar.html]. Or you can join a "list."

Once you sign up, that week's commentary will be automatically e-mailed to you. Some lists are one-way only — you receive a weekly mailing. Others allow you to respond and offer your own insights. Most of these lists are "moderated," which means there is someone in charge to make sure the correspondence remains on topic – and civil. For a selection of lists, see Virtual Jerusalem's list of lists [http://www.virtual.co.il/city_services/lists/torah.htm] and Shema Yisrael at [http://www.shemayisrael.co.il/parsha/index.htm].

I have not attempted to evaluate any of these sites. The best way to decide if a commentator is for you is by subscribing or visiting on a regular basis.

The most comprehensive list of links to parshat hashavuah commentaries on the Internet can be found at Torahnet [http://shamash.org/reform/uahc/torahnet/].

You really have to marvel at the dedication involved in compiling a page like this. Yasher koach to Eric Simon and everyone else involved at the Union of American Hebrew Congregations Web site!

If you prefer to LISTEN to a lecture rather than read one, try out 613.org: The First World-Wide Jewish Audio Since Mount Sinai. You'll find the parsha classes at [http://www.613.org/parasha.html] and more audio lectures at Think Jewish International [http://www.thinkjewish.com/series.html]. (You'll need the free RealAudio player to hear these lectures [http://get.real.com/products/player/download.html]).

And for something different, go to Torah Tidbits [http://www.cyberscribe.com/tt/] and click on Parsha Pix & Stats. Every week, you'll get a screen full of pictures that relate in some way to the Torah portion. Sometimes that relationship is straightforward; sometimes the connection is a bit cryptic. As the site says, "ParshaPix are a great way to go over the parsha with your children, challenge them before they challenge you."

So learn, discuss and enjoy. But as you travel the Jewish Highway, please remember that what you print will often include G-d's name.

Respect the sanctity of the material.

Next time, I will look at how you can read the Torah on line and survey Internet resources for b'nai and b'not mitzvah.

Until then, have a happy Shavuot.

Police units' killers joined SS Galician Division: Littman

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canadian authorities are doing virtually nothing about the "largest uninvestigated pool of accused war criminals," states a recent article in Response, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre's quarterly magazine.

As many as 2,000 members of the 14th Waffen-SS Volunteer Grenadier Division, also known as the Galician Division, were allowed to settle in Canada after 1950 and since that time they have lived "undisturbed" in Canada.

"The division was composed largely of former members of auxiliary police units recruited by the Germans to serve as executioners of the Ukrainian Jewish population," states the Response article, written by Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre.

Littman said he has researched the division over a 15-year span, studying archives in Germany, Britain, the United States and Canada. In addition, Polish and British historians have published scholarly work about the division's activities.

That research confirms that "most of the members of the division were former auxiliary policemen operating as part of Nazi einsatzgruppen," mobile killing units that rounded up and shot Jews and Communists behind the advance of German forces.

The article points out that after the battle of Stalingrad, in which the Germans lost enormous numbers of men, SS leader Heinrich Himmler agreed to permit Ukrainians into the SS. Members of Police Battalion 201, which cooperated with Einsatzkommando 5 of Einsatzgruppe C, were the first recruits. That unit, in turn, was drawn from two Ukrainian-staffed battalions, Roland and Nachtigall, that followed German forces into the Soviet Union and took part in pogroms against Jews.

In addition to Battalion 201, the Galician Division recruited personnel from the 31st Sicherheitsdienst, Ukrainian Auxiliary Police Battalion 204 and SS-Freiwillige Grenadier Regiments 29, 30 and 31.

"Before joining the division, these police units, operating behind the battle lines, had murdered thousands of men, women and children in Lvov, Tarnopil, Lutsk, Kremianets, Voldymyr, Odessa, Izamil, Mikolaiv, Brailow, Vinnytsia, Luminets, Pidhaitsi and Ustalych," Littman writes.

The division was captured by British forces in Austria at the end of the war and transferred to Italy. The British Home Secretary urged Canada to take in 2,000 of the men. After receiving assurances the men had been subjected to security checks and there were no war criminals among them, Canada accepted them.

The presence in Canada of members of the division prompted a letter of protest to Justice Minister Allan Rock. "Given their participation in Hitler's Final Solution, it is shameful they should continue to enjoy the benefits of Canadian citizenship," Littman states.

He called on war crimes investigators to cross-check their names with the names of the 1,882 recipients of SS pension in Canada.

"We want to look at each individual case as a matter of simple justice," he said.

The Response article got mixed reviews from historian Alti Rodal, who agreed "it's certainly likely that people from police units and Roland and Nachtigall could have moved into the SS." But, she continued, that must be determined on an individual by individual basis.

Rodal, who served as director of historical research for the Deschenes Commission, said it's possible the Galician Division recruited men who had participated in atrocities against Jews. She agreed with Littman that the British "did very flimsy and inadequate screening.

"I agree they should be investigated but it's wrong to call them, as a unit, murderers."

Paul Vickery, head of the Justice Department's war crimes unit, said the involvement of police units in atrocities could be true, but his investigators require specific allegations against individuals.

"We will have our historians review the article to see if it includes anything helpful," he said.

Rights body to examine 'Zundelsite'

cision whether to permit three Jewish organizations to participate as interveners in the hearing. B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, the Simon Wiesenthal Centre and the CHRA are all seeking to participate in the hearing, arguing they have a special interest and unique expertise to offer the tribunal.

Citing its expertise in monitoring hate propaganda and anti-Semitism, lawyer Marvin Kurz said "the League sees Zundel as one of the leading purveyors of materials that expose Jews to hatred and contempt" and would like to see him stopped.

Christie opposed the applications and unleashed a verbal barrage on the three Jewish organizations. B'nai Brith came in for a scathing attack as Christie argued the organization had made common cause with Anti-Racist Action (ARA) and so, in effect, condoned statements shouted at ARA rallies to burn and kill Zundel.

He later attacked the CHRA's application, pointing out that Citron, its current vice-president, is one of the complainants. In addition, he said, Citron has a strong animus against Zundel and has opposed him since the early 1980s when Zundel faced loss of his posting privileges for allegedly sending hate material in the mail.

Later, Citron said "we wouldn't even know Zundel if he hadn't engaged in hate propaganda for all those years." His material "demonizes Jews and me in particular." Citron has filed a libel claim against Zundel for allegedly defamatory materials published about her.

Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said the centre is attempting to intervene because "Zundel's use of the Internet is a concern for any human rights agenda."

He suggested the case will set a precedent in connection with the application of human rights legislation to the information highway.

Eddie Taylor, legal counsel for the commission, said "this is the first case regarding the Internet. We're confident that section 13 (1) of the Canadian Human rights Act is broad enough to cover the Internet as a telephonic transmission."

It's the commission's contention that use of telephone wires and a modem (the device that links computers to telephone lines) brings the communication within the section's ambit, he said.

Taylor said it is likely the case will go to the Supreme Court, a process that could take years. A British Columbia human rights case involving telephone answering machines operated by the white supremacist Liberty Net will go to the Supreme Court in the fall for argument. That case began before a tribunal eight years ago, he said.

The most severe sanction Zundel could face is a cease and desist order. Should he fail to comply with it, he could be held in contempt and face one year in jail.

ANNIVERSARY MISSION FILLING FAST

More than 125 community members have already made their date with history by registering for an historic mission.

UJA Federation's Mission '98, February 23 - March 4, celebrating Israel's 50th anniversary includes airfare, five-star hotel accommodations, breakfast and many additional meals, all touring, guides, entrance fees, porters and transfers. The cost is $2,498 per person, with a minimum campaign contribution of $250 per person for each of the next two years.

Participants will experience the sights and sounds of Israel from Metulla in the north to Jerusalem, south to Eilat and dozens of places in between. The itinerary will be customized for those who have already visited Israel and first-timers like Morris and Marilyn Ray.

"We've never been to Israel before and this is a great opportunity for us to finally see what our friends have been talking about for years," says Marilyn.

Many of those registered for Mission 98 visited Israel last year on the hugely successful Mission 3000 with 1,100 participants from across Canada. "Mission 3000 was the most well-organized, well-thought out and well-executed mission my wife and I have ever been on," notes Harvey Atkin. "It whet our appetite for something bigger and better."

In addition to popular highlights, Mission 98 participants will be able to visit sites of special interest in smaller groups. Special 50th anniversary festivities across the country will adorn the mission intineray.

Naomi and Lionel Larry have a special reason for going on Mission 98 ten years after participating on the first UJA Federation mission to Israel. "I'll be turning 50 as well," explains Naomi, "so my husband and I decided there was no where else we want to be."

"This is a unique opportunity to celebrate our commitment to Jewish community and a landmark in Israel's history," says Mission Chair Sandra Brown.

BROWN STEPS DOWN WITH FAITH IN THE FUTURE

Next week Sandra Brown will complete her term as President of UJA Federation. Her presidency enhanced a long tradition of strong communal leadership. In an interview with Community Matters she takes a look back at the last two years with pride, hope and a reaffirmation of UJA Federation's role in guaranteeing a bright future for the Jewish community.

Q: What goals did you want UJA Federation to achieve when you took office in 1995?

A. I saw our objectives as comprising a four point program which focused on internal and external restructuring and repositioning, financial resource development and strengthening ties with Israel. I was particularly concerned with building community through closer ties with synagogues, diverse elements of the Jewish community and other organizations, as well as improving the way we tell people about what UJA Federation does. All of these, I believe, will pull our community together and make it stronger.

Q: How much closer has UJA Federation come to realizing these goals.

A. I think we've come a long way, especially in the area of community-building. We've spent the last two years reaching out through joint programming, expanded communication and coalition building around some very important issues, such as budget cuts and the Branson Hospital closure battle. In campaign, we've opened the lines of communication with communities we've never reached before and introduced new exciting initiatives such as the York Region telethon and Youth Symposium. UJA Federation's first mission to Morocco just returned and was very successful. Put simply, I believe more people know who we are and what we do and want to be a part of it.

Q: What new initiatives are you most hopeful and excited about?

A. Our Legacy campaign, although a large undertaking, will ensure future funding for our precious Jewish infrastructure. I am also very impressed with the growth and development of our Junior UJA program which teaches children, from an early age, about the importance of feeling part of a community and helping each other through tzedakah. I'm also glad to see the Gift of Israel program off the ground because I believe very strongly that young people will feel closer to their Jewish roots given the opportunity to visit Israel.

Q: What were some of the highlights of your term?

A. I feel priviledged to have been invited to represent UJA Federation at so many different events. I really saw how the community worked and I was always pleasantly surprised. I wish others could be exposed to the big picture. I was also proud to have participated in the Jewish Agency's annual meeting in Jerusalem along with many of my colleagues and to see the Three Year Vision succeed the way it has.

Q: Any disappointments?

A. We still have a lot of work to do in many ways but that will come with time I'm sure. I am a little disappointed with the limited access we have to government despite our joint efforts with Canadian Jewish Congress. Ours is an important voice that we must fight to make heard.

Q: How has this experience affected you personally?

A. It's been extremely gratifying for me to have been a part of this important organization. To me UJA Federation is a catalyst for Jewish life in our community. It's also very heartwarming and empowering to know how many people share my concerns, especially our dedicated volunteers and staff.

Q: What are your parting words as President?

A. We need to have more pride in our community and work together to meet the challenges before us. We are truly one of the finest Jewish communities in the world.

KOSCHITZKYS RECEIVE SADOWSKI AWARD

Henry and Julia Koschitzky

Julia and Henry Koschitzky are the first couple to receive one of the Jewish community's most prestigious volunteer recognition awards.

The Toronto husband and wife team are recipients of the 1997 Ben Sadowski Award, which recognizes individuals with long standing records of senior community service within UJA Federation and the larger Jewish community.

Henry and Julia's dedication to enhancing Jewish life in Toronto, Israel and Jewish communities around the world, has led them to assume leadership positions in many major Jewish organizations.

Julia has just completed her term as Chair of the Keren Hayesod World Board of Trustees, during which she travelled the entire KH world, from Argentina to Hong Kong, raising millions of dollars for Jewish Agency projects. Next month she will be presented with the 1997 Israel Goldstein Prize, Keren Hayesod's highest honour.

In June 1992, Julia finished a two-year term as President of UIA Canada.

Julia chaired UJA Federation's Women's Campaign in 1985, the general campaign in 1988 and, two years later, helped to direct the historic and highly successful Operation Exodus, which raised $45 million for Soviet Jews emigrating to Israel.

Julia still maintains regular involvement with the UJA/UIA-funded Jewish Agency and currently sits on both the Jewish Agency Board of Governors and Executive. She is also active with several other charities and organizations including Mt. Sinai Hospital, Associated Hebrew Schools, the Canadian Jewish News and UJA Federation's Legacy Fundraising Cabinet.

Henry Koschitzky's deep commitment to Jewish education has led to numerous leadership positions including President of Associated Hebrew Schools, Founder and Vice President of Toronto's Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot schools, Chairman of the Board of Jewish Education and member of Yeshiva University's Board of Directors. Henry, a Rhodes scholar and devout Talmud student, who founded with his brother and parents, the Orot College for Women in Israel, was also instrumental in creating a professorship endowment at York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

Henry's long-time involvement with UJA Federation and UIA Canada includes many years on both Boards of Directors and active participation in UIA's Hineni circle for major campaign contributors.

GRANOVSKY LEGACY SYMBOLIZED IN AWARD

David Engel

UJA Federation's highly respected David Engel has been chosen as the first recipient of the Phil Granovsky Award for Campaign Excellence.

The award, created in memory of the legendary community leader and activist who passed way earlier this year, honours individuals who exemplify the best in UJA Federation campaigning. Phil Granovsky and his brother Irving were the first million dollar UJA Federation contributors.

Granovsky supported UJA Federation for more than 40 years. He played an integral role in early campaigns surrounding the birth of Israel and later headed up major UJA/UIA funded projects such as the Phil Granovsky Family Auditorium in Kiryat Shmona. He and his wife Shirley also sponsored a special Jewish Agency flight bringing Soviet Jews to Israel in 1991.

Engel's continual fundraising efforts and high campaign visibility throughout his more than ten-year involvement with UJA Federation, have led to a second term as Vice-Chair of the annual campaign which raised $35.5 million last year.

A graduate of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program, David quickly worked his way up to chairing UJA Federation's Marketing Division, the Young Leadership Network and the Walk for Israel. He also has been a USDS Board member for four years, having previously served on the school's executive.

In 1995, the depth and spirit of Engel's commitment to UJA Federation was affirmed when he spearheaded the "Delta Force," a drive to improve volunteer and donor relations. New directions included personalized thank-you letters and one-on-one campaign training. The businessman and father of three even assumed the persona and garb of community-minded super hero, "Delta Dave," to launch the initiative with style.

AWARDS RECOGNIZE COMMUNITY SERVICE

At the June 9 UJA Federation annual meeting, awards will be presented to honour individuals who have dedicated years of service to Toronto's Jewish community. Their long hours of work, creativity and commitment have touched so many lives.

SHEM TOV AWARDS

These awards are presented annually to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service to Toronto's Jewish community.

Shem Tov Award winners (from left, seated): Peter Shenfield, Marlene Axmith, Yvonne Martell and (from left, standing) Morley Wolfe, Michael Bowman and Ronald Hoffman.

MARLENE AXMITH
UJA Federation Women's Campaign

Marlene's dedication to community is reflected both in her professional career as Assistant Director for the Baycrest Centre Campaign, and her extensive involvement with UJA Federation, which includes chairing the 1996 Women's Campaign. Marlene also serves on the Boards of Jewish Camp Council, Jewish Women's Federation, Beth Tikvah Synagogue, and Jewish Family and Child Service.

MICHAEL BOWMAN
Jewish Family and Child Service

Michael, a partner at Osler, Hoskin & Harcourt, is President of Jewish Family and Child Service. His twelve year involvement with JF&CS includes chairing the Child & Youth Services Committee and the York Region Services Committee, and serving as a member of the Family Rehabilitation Committee. A graduate of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program, Michael is active in Shaar Shalom Synagogue.

RONALD HOFFMAN
Reena Foundation

Ronald is a lawyer and Vice-President of Gamma North Peel Laboratory Ltd. He is the Chair of Reena Foundation, a charity with which he has been involved for eight years. Ronald has also served on the Executive of the Jewish National Fund and as President of Adath Israel Brotherhood, Vice-President of the Canadian Council for Conservative Judaism and Chair of the Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism.

YVONNE MARTELL
Bernard Betel Centre

Yvonne is Program Coordinator for Senior Adult Services at the Bathurst Jewish Centre and President of the Bernard Betel Centre. She has been a Board member at the Bernard Betel Centre since 1983. Yvonne co-chaired UJA Federation's Shalom Toronto program, 1993-1995, and sits on the Board and Management Committee of Yeshiva Or Chaim.

PETER SHENFIELD
Jewish Vocational Services

Peter, an executive recruiter for Baker Harris/A.T. Carney Executive Search & Co., is the Immediate Past President of Jewish Vocational Services. In addition to his volunteer years with JVS, Peter has worked with the Human Resource Professionals Association of Ontario for twelve years, serving as President in 1989.

MORLEY WOLFE, Q.C.
Jewish Camp Council

Morley, the President of the Jewish Camp Council, is a provincial Deputy Judge and Justice of the Peace. He has held almost every position on the Board of JCC and continues to be a hands-on volunteer within the Council. His other community involvement includes B'nai Brith Canada, and Canadian Jewish Congress.

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT AWARDS

These awards were established to encourage young women and men to assume community leadership roles. They are presented to individuals who demonstrate extraordinary community commitment and service.

DOV ALTMAN

Dov is the manager of property administration for Toronto's Economic Development Corporation. A UJA Federation Leadership Development graduate, Dov is a UJA Federation Board member, a long-time member of UJA Federation's Social Planning & Allocations Committee and past Chair of the Group and Recreational Services Sub-Committee. Dov also chairs the New Leadership Division at the Canadian Shaarei Tzedec Hospital Foundation and is Vice-Chair of the BBYO Board of Directors.

EILEEN SILVER

Eileen, an alumnus of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program, has been President of United Synagogue Day School since 1995 and a USDS Board member since 1989. In addition to serving on the Board of Jewish Education and on BJC committees, Eileen is active in Beth Tzedec Congregation and co-chairs the synagogue's Little Minyan alternative service.

ENDOWMENT FUND FOCUSES ON COMMUNITY PROJECTS

Organizations dedicated to the preservation of Yiddish language and culture were big winners in a recent round of grants allocated by the Endowment Fund of UJA Federation.

A total of $220,000 was awarded to eight projects associated with social services, education and culture.

"Our biggest problem is that we have far more applications for grants than we are able to give," said Alan Sandler, UJA Federation's vice president of Community Planning & Allocations.

A substantial grant was given to the second Ashkenaz festival, to be held at Harbourfront Centre at the end of August, because, according to Sandler, the 1995 festival was "a tremendous attraction for the community."

Bruce Rosensweet, executive director of Nayeh Velt Cultural Initiatives, which sponsors Ashkenaz, billed as the world's largest festival of new Yiddish culture, said the endowment grant represents an endorsement of Ashkenaz by the mainstream community. "For us, it's a level of recognition we've been looking for from UJA Federation.... We came out of nowhere. We built this thing out of nothing."

A second project promoting Yiddish, the Toronto Yiddish Education Centre, was also an award winner. Ethel Cooper, chair of the Yiddish education committee, was "thrilled" to get the grant, she said. "This gives us an opportunity to take the existing school further."

She said the Committee for Yiddish has been operating a heritage language program, jointly funded by the education boards of North York and York Region, for 75 children on Sundays at the Finch campus of Associated Hebrew Schools. The program attracts Jewish children from all religious streams, who have no other opportunity to learn Yiddish. "There is a growing interest in Yiddish language and culture at all levels," she noted. "People recognize that Yiddish must be carried on."

Two other approved applications are geared to creating employment opportunities for immigrants and welfare recipients. One project, jointly submitted by Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) and Jewish Vocational Services (JVS), assists clients from JF&CS to become financially self-sufficient through re-employment. JF&CS recruits the clients while a JVS professional prepares them for the work force with job-readiness training, before connecting them with potential employers.

"We're delighted to get the grant. It's a priority in the community to help people find employment," said JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe. "The highest level of tzedaka is helping a person to be self-sustaining. By being self-sufficient they maintain their dignity."

Another employment project, sponsored by JVS and Jewish Immigrant Aid Service (JIAS), will match immigrants who have achieved a high proficiency in English with three month co-op placements in the community.

Perry Romberg, executive director of JIAS, said the grant will allow the agency's small pilot project to expand.

Others receiving Endowment Fund grants include the Israel Experience and Education Framework, a JF&CS and Reena-supported program to assist people with developmental handicaps and their families, the Jewish Toronto Web Site and Dr. Yaacov Glickman who is preparing a publication on Jewish ethnic survival in Canada.

In 1995, the Ashkenaz Festival kicked off with a colourful parade along Toronto's Harbourfront. This year's parade will run from City Hall to the Lakeshore once again. (Photo: Nir Bareket.)

UJA Walk draws 8,000

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — An estimated 8,000 people donned their walking shoes for the annual community Walk for Israel sponsored by UJA Federation.

For the first time in its 29-year history, the walk encompassed two routes, both culminating at North York Centennial Centre. The 5-kilometre morning route originated at the Promenade Mall in Thornhill, while the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) was the starting point for the new 2-km afternoon route.

Gilda Niman, chair of the south route march, said the new route was added to give the supplementary schools, most of which hold classes Sunday morning, a chance to participate in the walkathon.

About 1,000 people took part, she said. "The spirit was just as evident at 12:30 as it was at 10:30."

An additional 2,000 people joined the marchers at the arena for a lively community festival with continuous entertainment and activities for participants of all ages.

UJA Federation spokesperson Howard English estimated that at the height of the festivities there were 10,000 people at the arena.

He said the walkathon is the community's largest event.

Carole Sterling, chair of Walk '97, praised the efforts of the many volunteers and the UJA staff who made the walk such a success.

She also called upon the community to get ready for next year's march from City Hall to Ontario Place to mark Israel's 50th birthday.

The festival was a gigantic party with food, music and non-stop entertainment. DJ Corey Mandell, a festival co-chair, hosted the festivities. The live music concert was performed by a roster of professional entertainers: the Simpletones, the Stars Band with Liberty Silver, Matt Dean, Shelly's Band and Kim Doron.

Children participated in a wide array of activities, including virtual reality video games, a batting cage, bingo, arts and crafts, a petting zoo, a jumping castle and pony rides.

Children also played an important role in the walkathon which added $150,000 to UJA Federation coffers. Jaime Filer, and Jaimie Bregman of Leo Baeck Day School, and Arielle Hancu of United Synagogue Day Schools (USDS) were the students who raised the most money this year.

Filer, 9, has been among the walkathon's top child fundraisers for the last four years. She said the amount of money she raises increases every year because she keeps improving her fundraising techniques. She no longer asks people if they want to sponsor her, she said.

"Now I ask how much they want to sponsor me for. I know that this way they can't say no.

"It makes me very proud to know that even though I'm a little kid I can still make a contribution."

Chesed seen key to Jewish unity

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish unity will happen when Jews act towards each other with kindness, compassion and respect, asserts philosopher Rabbi Paysach Krohn.

Rabbi Krohn gave the fourth annual Sam and Sarah Kerzner Memorial Lecture, presented by Eitz Chaim Schools and endowed by their son, Joseph. The talk was at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

Rabbi Krohn, a mohel, is best known for a series of four books of inspirational tales, including The Magid Speaks and At the Magid's Table.

He gave his message in parables: the noted rabbi, close to death, who asked to be moved from the home for the aged where he was living to a far less pleasant place in Jerusalem, so the chevrah kadishah wouldn't have to carry his body such a long way; the man from Brooklyn who kept raincoats in his house so Shabbat guests wouldn't get wet walking home in the rain; the newsletter from the small settlement of Kiryat Sefer, offering help to others ranging from chickpeas for a family who didn't have time to buy food to celebrate a baby's birth to mousetraps to folding laundry

"It's not enough to hear about and see that someone is in trouble. You have to take action."

There is an obligation to return lost objects to their owner. One is not allowed, he said, to "hide yourself to avoid having to perform this mitzvah."

Take action

And one is not allowed to hide from lost people, people with problems – the sick, the poor, mourners.

One is not created for one's own benefit, the rabbi said. "G-d didn't give you talents for your own honor, but to help others."

Rabbi Krohn said that when he was going to Lucerne, he was asked to look in on a lonely, totally paralyzed patient in a nursing home.

"That patient was Yonah Melina, a man disabled in one of the terrorist bus bombings." Rabbi Krohn promised that in every speech he made from then on, he would mention Melina and encourage people to write him. Hundreds of people thus learned about this man, and wrote him and prayed for him. He is now in a nursing home in Israel. And people are still writing and praying for him.

Rabbi Krohn had several suggestions for the audience. First, he said, take a memo pad and don't go to sleep unless you have done an act of chesed (loving kindness).

(Even if you did five acts, write one, he advised. "You will keep on doing one.")

Also, he said, "every time you daven the Shmoneh Esrei, daven for someone else – not for 20 people, but for one or two. And daven as if it is your father, your mother, your brother or your sister you are praying for. That is achdut – real unity."

The audience of over 1,000 was welcomed by program chair Marvin Sigler. D'vrai Torah were given by Aliza Sturm and Yaakov Kipper, Grade 8 students at Eitz Chaim Schools.

Emunah Women pass torch to a new generation

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The torch is being passed to a new generation at Emunah Women of Toronto.

At the recent installation of officers, three members of Re'ut, the organization's youngest chapter, Laurie Teperman, Aryella Weisz and Renee Shields, joined the executive as vice-president fundraising, vice-president programming and office committee chair respectively.

Other officers elected this year included Edie Kalb as president, Sara Rachlin as treasurer, Esti Yeres as vice-president membership, and Lisa Parshan as recording secretary.

The installation formed part of Emunah Women's annual mother-in-Israel dinner. This year's event raised over $20,000 for Emunah projects in Israel, which include nurseries, day care centres, schools, and women's shelters.

Kalb said in her installation address that the suggestion that relations between Israel and the Diaspora will somehow change because of the peace process and the improving Israeli economy will not be true for Emunah.

"Emunah doesn't see itself as an organization that gives charity. We see Israel as an extension of our nation, and of our city . We will always see it like that, and so it is our responsibility to ensure Jewish continuity there by filling Israel's physical and spiritual needs."

Guest speaker Pnina Herzog, widow of former ambassador to Canada Yaakov Herzog, and chair of World Emunah, said that while Jews have always had an "unshakable belief that there will always be a better tomorrow," they must recognize and deal with danger signals to our survival.

These danger signals, she said, are not necessarily concerned with war and peace. Rather, she said, they are assimilation, extremism "at both ends of the spectrum" and ignorance "of who we are, what we are; our culture and our heritage."

The answer, Herzog said, lies in Jewish education.

Unlike in past days, the gates to gentile culture are open to Jews; in most places, Jews have equal rights, and the non-Jewish world is more moderate and tolerant.

Some see that as a threat and claim that Jews should avoid coming to grips with contemporary culture. Others, on the other hand, claim that there should be complete integration into secular culture.

"I believe that Jewish education should combine contemporary culture with our own culture and Jewish values. It should teach moderation, tolerance, dialogue and ahavat Yisrael."

She praised Emunah women not only for providing shelters for battered women, but for establishing programs that will prevent woman abuse in the future.

She urged the nearly 300 women present to work to increase membership in the organization by encouraging study, by involving younger members and by taking advantage of the special talents and skills of members.

During the month of Elul this year (September), Emunah is encouraging a month of study. Herzog said groups that will be open to all segments of the community will get together once a week to study.

The program was held at Inn on the Park. Dinner chair was Rita Weinberger. Greetings were brought by Israel consul general Jehudi Kinar and by Kurt Rothschild, chair of World Mizrachi and national president of the Canadian Zionist Federation.

From left, Emunah Women of Toronto officials Rita Weinberger, Hannah Schusheim-Beigel and Edie Kalb and guest speaker Pnina Herzog.

Quality of family life stressed at JF&CS meeting

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A family's Jewish content is more important than the form the family takes, leading educator Arna Poupko told last week's annual meeting of Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS).

Today's Jewish family "may never again resemble the traditional" two-parent model, Poupko said. "Far greater" is the threat of Jewish content and commitment — or the lack of them — in the family, she warned.

Judaism and the Jewish people "can rise to the challenges of any form the family takes, but [they] will not be able to survive lack of content," said Poupko, who plays a leading role in Montreal's Jewish education scene.

"Far more important than who is fulfilling aspects of the Jewish home, is whether they are done," she said. "Given the facts on the ground, we need to work with content."

Delivering an optimistic assessment of the Jewish condition today, Poupko said a Jewish family, whatever it looks like, "needs rooting in charming, noble, dignified and poetic Jewish values... The reason Judaism is compelling is not just about religion. It's about business ethics, conduct, intimacy and a sense of obligation."

Poupko believes the Jewish family will survive "because the Jewish people will survive."

Even though JF&CS had a balanced operating budget in 1996, continuing and past government

Richard Cummings

budget cuts are hitting hard, said outgoing president Michael Bowman.

And 'social service agencies' budgets "will continue to be eroded when the needs of the community are at their highest."

The number of children in the care of JF&CS reached an all-time high last year at 97, the meeting was told. As well, the agency distributed $1.3 million to over 2,000 people living in poverty.

Last year, JF&CS investigated 425 allegations of child abuse, and 300 abused women received counselling and support. The Jewish community is not immune to violence against women and children, says the agency's annual report.

In all, JF&CS served 2,760 cases last year.

Executive director Gordon Wolfe said society as a whole is experiencing increasing family breakdown, fewer resources and "kids under siege... Every signal we're getting is demanding we focus on profound change," he said.

Richard Cummings was welcomed as the new president of JF&CS for a two-year term. New board members are Harry Blaier, Georgina Cannon, Elsa Chandler, Sharyn Salsberg Ezrin, Cliff Nelson and Susan Shainhouse.

Wolfe paid tribute to agency staffers Dorothy Gelfand, Elliott Larman and Dorothy Singer for their 25 years of service.

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

"יונת האהבה" - דבש לנשמה.

חוה אלברשטיין לא זקוקה לדברי פתיחה והיכרות. כולם מכירים אותה. בשנות הששים והשבעים היא היתה האורים והתומים של הזמר העברי. אחר כך, בסוף שנות השבעים, באו ועלו זמרים וזמרות חדשים עם סגנונות חדשים ובמשך שנים ארוכות לא הצליחה להחדיר שירים חדשים לתודעה הכללית. כולם המשיכו לשיר את שיריה הישנים, אך החדשים נשכחו תקליט אחרי תקליט. ואני דווקא מצאתי את תקליטיה משנות השמונים הולכים ומשתבחים. בשנות השמונים הוציאה את התקליט "מהגרים" שכתבה בו את כל הטקסטים. השירים היו רגישים ונפלאים ועסקו בהרגשתם של מהגרים בכל מקום בעולם. אחר-כך בא תקליט "לונדון" המאוד מצליח ששוב הביא לתודעה את האופי הכל-כך רגיש שלה. עכשיו אני מקשיב ל"יונת האהבה", תקליט מומלץ כמתנה למי שאתם אוהבים באמת. שירים של התפכחות, על קושי החיים, על הנחמה שבאהבה, ובעיקר - שירים של אישה בת חמישים שלא מנסה להיראות ולהישמע בת עשרים. זה כל כך יפה , כי זמרים וזמרות מזדקנים הרבה פעמים מנסים להתחנחן לבני עשרים בסלנג שלהם, בקצבים שלהם. יש שם שיר אחד נפלא על ספינת דיוגים שחותרת בלילה, ועליה "דיוגים קשי יום", ובים "דגים קלי לילה", "ומותו של זה הוא חייו של זה"".

חוה אלברשטיין בת חמישים פלוס - ממש דבש לנשמה, ממש מרק עוף למוח.

"חיי אהבה"

בין כל הז'אנרים שהתפתחו בישראל בשנים האחרונות בולט סגנון כתיבה נשי, תוקפני, כאילו להגיד - אנחנו לא שונות מהגברים. אל תבינו לא טוב - יש הרבה כתיבה נשית נפלאה (בתיה גור, שולמית הר-אבן ורבות אחרות) אבל הספר הכי מדובר בישראל עכשיו ושנחטף כמו לחמניות הוא דווקא מהסוג הראשון. "חיי אהבה" הוא שם מטעה, כי אין בספר שום אהבה, אלא אם התכוונה הסופרת לתרגם מאנגלית ''לעשות אהבה'', שהיא כמובן פעולה גופנית שאינה בהכרח מלווה באהבה. הספר עוסק באשה בעירה, נשואה מבית טוב, שפוגשת בבית הוריה גבר בן ששים, חבר נעורים של אביה. פגישה מקרית זו מעוררת בה מיד סקרנות ומשיכה אל הגבר שאת סופה אתם יכולים לתאר לעצמכם. הכתיבה עצמה רהוטה, מעניינת, בלשון פשוטה ולא חגיגית אבל מעשיה של אותה צעירה יכולים לאכלס סרט כחול ממוצע. ואין שם אהבה, אין אפילו משיכה, הכל עניין של השפלה, עינוי והלקאה, ואין אתה מבין מה עניין שמיטה למיטה. בקיצור - אין שום הגיון במעשים. כמובן אפשר לומר "טוב, אבל הסופרת התכוונה למשהו יותר עמוק", מצטער חיפשתי ולא מצאתי. תגידו - טוב, בטח סופרת סוג גימל. לא ולא! צרויה שלו היא כלת פרס ראש הממשלה לשנת 1996. בקיצור: ראו הוזהרתם. (הוצאת כתר, 1997)

סוף היהדות החילונית?

נחום רוול (Ravel) מגיב על הטור של 24 באפריל, שבו דיברתי על ההתבוללות של ילדיהם של ישראלים חילוניים: "לדעתי ליהדות חילונית יש עתיד רק במדינת ישראל". מה דעתכם!

משהו טוב לחגים:

אם יש לכם ילדים שמנגנים פסנתר, או אם אתם מנגנים פסנתר בעצמכם ובא לכם להשתמש בו לחזור למקורות שלכם, יש לי משהו חדש בשבילכם: צבי טאוב, מוסיקאי מקומי, הוציא חוברת של שירי חגים לפסנתר, עם עיבודים מאוד קלים ויפים. אצלנו כמו אצלכם חוגגים את חגי ישראל עם שירים. אם יש לכם פסנתר - החוברות האלה יעשו לכם את החג! Celebration Showcase a must see

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Consult the experts, sample great food and hear some of the best bands and DJs at Celebration Showcase '98, Le Parc, Markham, Nov. 18, 4 to 10 p.m.

Produced by Beryl McLeod and Raphy Amar, president and owner of Beverly Hills Caterers, the exclusive kosher caterer at Le Parc, the showcase is a must-see for anyone planning a simchah.

"This show includes professionals from every aspect of party planning including florists, photographers and videographers, limousine drivers, musicians and decorators. As well, it will introduce people to our kosher catering services and give them the opportunity to see the banquet halls available when they plan their party with us," says Amar.

Trade show includes pros of all types

The show, which is free of charge, "will give visitors a chance to see how we set up our sweet tables including fruit carvings and ice carvings. We want them to see what we're all about."

Beverly Hills Caterers is under supervision of the Kashruth Council, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, (COR). In addition, Le Parc's kitchen has "state-of-the-art facilities and equipment that allow it to serve from 200 to 2000 people," Amar says.

Hors d'oeuvres, some of which visitors to the showcase will sample, include the traditional, such as potato knishes, sweet and sour meatballs and potato latkes; Italian, such as mini pizza with grilled chicken, fried zucchini fingers and tomato and pesto; or Chinese, such as mini-egg rolls with plum sauce, beef teriyaki or tempura vegetables.

Pasta dishes will also be sampled, says Amar, and some of Beverly Hills' specialties include fettuccini, spaghettini and bow tie pasta in such sauces as bolognese, basil pesto sauce, veal sauce, or sun dried tomatoes, pesto and pinenuts.

Amar also offers a variety of dinner entrées ranging from roast prime rib eye of beef au jus and roast brisket of beef with mushroom sauce to rack of lamb aux fines herbes, stuffed rock cornish hen with wild rice and Atlantic salmon or fresh red snapper.

"Visitors can peruse our menus, talk to us and air some concerns at the party show. People today just do not have the time to shop around. The purpose of this show is to present everything to them under one roof and let them chat with various people about their party needs. It also gives our exhibitors an opportunity to show their stuff. It's a winning formula," Amar says.

Making in-laws disappear (and other neat tricks!)

By SIMONE JOSEPH
CJN Staff

He can make your bat mitzvah girl float in the air. He can saw your groom in half. He can even make your in-laws disappear.

Jason Palter, a ventriloquist and magician, (410-JSON (5766)) provides entertainment for celebrations such as bnei/bnot mitzvah and anniversary parties.

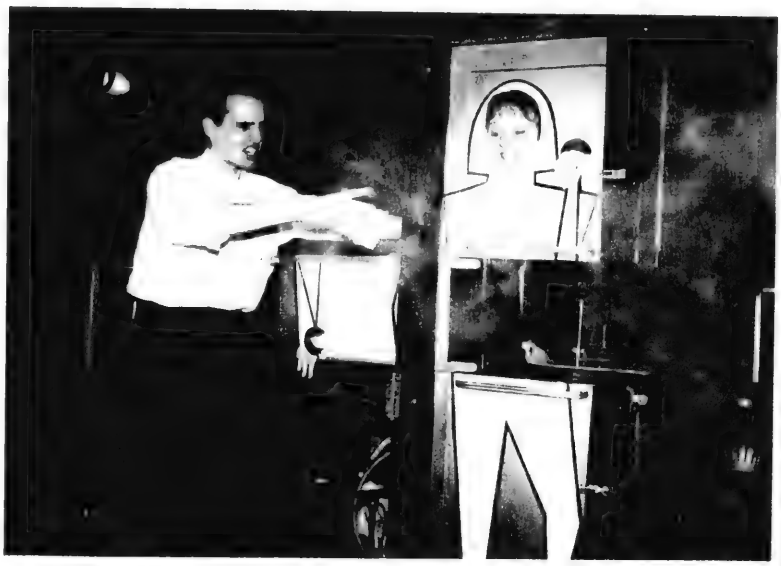
Each performance is a light-hearted, comedic show, whether it's for kids, adults or a business crowd. "It is more of a comedy as opposed to a serious, glitzy Las-Vegasy type show", he says.

According to Palter, some people want to spice up their simchahs with something unique because "they're all the same...They have the speeches, they have the dancing, they have the dinner or the lunch — that's it. It's the '90's. People are looking for something different," he says.

Palter's performances range from close-up magic, which involves performing small-scale magic tricks such as card, coin and rope tricks, to stage shows which include lots of audience participation and may incorporate large-scale magic illusions and ventriloquism.

Stage shows tend to be 20 to 30 minutes long while close-up magic, which works well with larger audiences, is based on an hourly rate and can last from one to four hours.

Palter says it is important to remember an audience's attention span. "I always leave them wanting more and I always want people to say 'wow that was good, we want him back.'"



Jason Palter cuts a trusting (and perhaps non-paying) client in half. (Just kidding!)

Bnei/bnot mitzvah or wedding packages start at approximately $175. Cost is based on such things as type of performance (close-up or stage magic), length, customization (Does something special have to be designed or constructed for the show?), size of the audience or travelling time.

Palter's shows often focus on the guest of honor. Recently, he performed at a bat mitzvah and did a half-hour show of comedy, magic, mentalism and interaction with the audience, which ended with the illusion of a floating bat mitzvah girl.

For an upcoming wedding, the bride-to-be has asked Palter to create the illusion of sawing her groom in half and putting him back together.

He often custom-designs tricks. For a bar mitzvah boy, he might play a card trick in which he predicts which card the boy will choose. When he takes the card out of his pocket it has a mazel tov message and it is dated and signed. He has also been known to make a bride or a birthday boy appear on stage.

Palter will perform for almost

Party favors make personalized gifts

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Choosing party favors for your bar mitzvah guests does not have to be a daunting task says Lou Hoffer, who owns Tri-Versa-Global with Steven Levitt (905-771-6494).

In business for 10 years, the pair specialize in imprinting over 30,000 promotional products ranging from mousepads and baseballs to mugs, frisbees and water bottles.

"The days of offering only shirts and boxer shorts as take-home gifts are over," says Hoffer. "Hosts need to shop according to their budget, and we have something to suit everyone."

Levitt, the resident graphic artist, is equipped with a computer system complete with color scanner, says Hoffer, so that all gifts are personalized on the premises. "There is a faster turn-around this way. Clients can come in, choose their gifts and have the artwork done quickly."

The showroom is so jam-packed, he says, it takes at least an hour to inspect everything the company offers. "We've even done personalized, embroidered robes as a bride's gift to her bridesmaids."

Hoffer and Levitt are happy to work with party planners so that they can choose gifts according to a party theme.

Outback Jack (top) and Tri-Versa Global (left) offer lots of ideas for party favors.

"If the party is revolved around a beach theme, for instance, we can provide personalized beach balls."

Hoffer says that although they can provide gifts at the last minute, he suggests coming in at least four weeks in advance to ensure that there is time to have the artwork checked. "We make sure everything is perfect before it goes out the door."

Cartoon fans will love a personalized print of Outback Jack (530-9551) and his family, involved in a variety of activities.

Distributor Mark Litman says the "family-oriented cartoon characters come complete with the parents and four children in a variety of poses. One scene has the family in the bathtub. The towels are monogrammed with the guest's or bar mitzvah boy's name."

Litman comes to a party with the various prints set up on a velcro board and he personalizes each one by computer.

"The guests just love it. It's something they'll hang on their wall and have forever," he says.

A unique idea, says Litman, is to order the prints ahead of time and use them as place settings.

The prints can come in an acrylic, gold or silver metal or matted frame. "Hosts can choose before the party or they can give their guests a choice. Everything depends on their budget."

Kenny brings experience to Ruffles Hair Design

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When it comes to hair color Kenny has seen it all.

With more than 30 years of experience, Kenny the hair technician at Ruffles Hair Design (226-3205), located at 5997 Bathurst St., just south of Steeles Avenue, says the basic method of dying hair hasn't changed that much since 1966 when he began working.

"The chemicals are basically the same. Bleach is bleach. Color is color."

But ideas and techniques have changed, he adds. "Now highlights are done on natural-colored hair. They're done on any kind of hair."

He says that temporary color that lasts six to eight weeks before fading is relatively new. Temporary color can hide grey streaks, but a permanent with dye is needed to cover hair that's gone all grey, he notes.

Kenny uses a vegetable-based dye without ammonia and "strange chemicals" – it's been on the Canadian market four to five years – for covering grey hair.

Bleaching makes the hair more porous so that it absorbs color more easily, he explains. Generally he recommends touching up the roots every four weeks.

As for perms the new ones are much milder and it's possible to perm any kind of hair, but one must still be careful when applying color to permed hair to avoid damaging the hair, he says.

Hair color goes in and out of fashion. This year Kenny says that red, copper, gold and earth colors are very popular and shading done with highlights is also a trend.

He advises brides to look as natural as possible on the big day. They can add a few highlights or temporary color to enhance their natural color. He also suggests that brides wear their hair long because it's more feminine.

Mandell Entertainment launches own web-site

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Corey Mandell, one of the most popular DJs among the pre-teen set, is considered by some to be king of Toronto's bar mitzvah party circuit.

Mandell has parlayed his popularity into a successful party entertainment business offering a variety of services which include interactive DJs, dancers, party planning and decor.

The Mandell Entertainment Group, (905-886-4000) now in its sixth year, is one of the largest DJ companies in the Greater Toronto Area (GTA), employing more than 100 full- and part-time staff. The number of staff has tripled in the last three years, Mandell notes.

He recently expanded operations across the country, opening satellite offices in Montreal, Calgary and Vancouver and now he's poised to penetrate the international market via cyber-space. This month he'll be officially launching an interactive Web site called the Party Network [http://www.thepn.com].

"We're offering a virtual party planning site for the bar and bat mitzvah market," he says. "The site runs 24 hours a day, seven days a week.

"People can go on line and research different elements for their party. We've listed photographers, DJs, bands, halls, decorators florists.

By clicking onto the names of the people and companies listed on the Entertainment Network, users will be able to access their Web sites and get a more in-depth appreciation of what the companies have to offer, Mandell says.

"There's unlimited information on line."

Provides tips on party topics

He's been testing out the network for a year and so far there have been 8,000 visits to the site, he says.

The Party Network provides tips on such topics as party planning, candlelighting and theme decorating. People can ask questions on line and a party consultant answers 10 of the most asked "generic" questions every week, Mandell says.

Mandell Entertainment also has its own Web site with a photo gallery. It can be reached at [http://www.mandelldj.com] and "has had thousands of hits" (people who clicked on his site), he notes.

He also has a unique offer for the b'nei mitzvah children who use Mandell Entertainment for their parties: Each of them will get their own Web page through Mandell's site for three months prior to the big event.

They can leave messages for friends and people can RSVP for the party through e-mail hook up, Mandell explains. His staff will be editing the pages before any information is posted, he adds.

While bnei/bnot mitzvah are its mainstay, Mandell Entertainment also gets more than 100 bookings a year for corporate and special events, he says.

"Some corporations heard about us through the grapevine and took a chance on us. We've held on to those contracts year after year."

During the summer when the bar mitzvah business is slow, Mandell's DJs tour predominantly Jewish summer camps north of Toronto. They'll also be touring in Quebec this summer.

Roots sponsors these tours. Roots owners Michael Budman and Don Green " thought it would be a great idea to give something back to the kids," Mandell said.

Vegetarian cookbooks reflect global diversity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Whether you eat to live or live to eat, a cookbook is always a useful addition around the kitchen.

The cookbooks under review, whose accent is on vegetarianism, reflect the diversity of our global village.

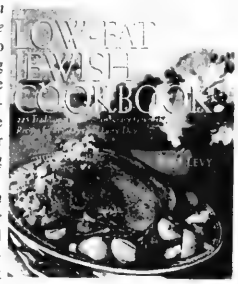
The Jewish Vegetarian Year Cookbook (Micah Publications, $24), written by Roberta Kalechofsky and Rosa Rasiel, caters to the needs of readers who have definitely forsaken meat. The authors are knowledgeable and their recipes are easy to follow. This is food that shmecks.

The Low-Fat Jewish Cookbook (Crown Publishers, $24.95 US) debunks the myth that kosher fare is fattening. Faye Levy offers delicious, low-fat versions of 225 classic favorites and contemporary dishes for everyday cooking, holidays and entertainment.

Matthew Biggs's Complete Book of Vegetables (Raincoast Books, $29.95) is an all-in-one book which offers sound advice on cultivating and cooking vegetables. Complemented by more than 500 beautifully reproduced color photographs, this sumptuous book contains some 200 recipies.

Veggies will be pleased with the new series of elegant and lavishly-illustrated vegetarian cookbooks distributed by Raincoast Books of Vancouver.

The Vegetarian Table: America ($29.95), written by Deborah Madisop, is inspired by time-honored regional cooking which any cook can add to his/her repertoire. The 75 delectable dishes here run the gamut from soups and salads to entrees.



The Vegetarian Table: France ($26.95) brings to life the tantalizing cuisine of the French countryside. Georgeanne Brennan is your guide to dining with savoir faire.

The Vegetarian Table: Italy ($24.95) covers all the bases, including antipasti, first courses and main courses and side dishes. Julia Della Croce's book can turn a meal into a feast.

The Vegetarian Table: Mexico ($24.95) draws on pre-Columbian and Spanish culinary traditions. Victoria Wise shows you how to work magic with vegetables, grains and fruits.

The Vegetarian Table: North Africa ($29.95) is redolent of cinnamon, saffron and ginger, several of the major spices which grace Maghreb food. Kitty Morse introduces readers to such mouth-watering dishes as cheese puffs, spinach phyllo cigars, Algerian chili and couscous with dried fruit.

Thai food, which is increasingly popular in the West, is based on fresh ingredients and exotic flavors, as you will learn when you delve into Charmaine Solomon's Thai Cookbook (Raincoast Books, $24.95). This first-rate guide to Thailand's flavorful cuisine is supplemented by graphically enticing photographs.

Herbs, be they basil, coriander or parsley, add zest to any meal. In Jekka's Complete Herb Book (Raincoast Books, $19.95), Jekka McVicar, an authority in the field, explains how to grow a herb garden and how to seamlessly blend herbs into a wide variety of inventive dishes.

The Penguin Book of Food and Drink (Penguin, $32.99), edited by Paul Levy, is an anthology of astonishingly fine writing on gastronomy. For example: Claudia Roden writes stylishly on Middle Eastern food. Nobel Prize laureate Elias Canetti describes the heady aromas of fresh bread. Edward Behr ruminates on the goodness of salt. Richard Olney rhapsodizes about wine and cooking. A.J. Liebling explores the joys of a good palate.

Use referrals when choosing a kosher caterer

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

How do you choose a kosher caterer? Joe Elmaleh of King Solomon's Table (416-630-0303), Linda Sugar of Adath Catering (416-638-6522) and Sari Gorman of GMB Culinary Productions (416-322-3279) all offer tips on making a wise choice.

Use referrals from friends as a guide, Sugar says, but you should also get references from other professionals who work with caterers, like photographers.

To make a decision, come taste for yourself, says Elmaleh. Clients should shop around and make the competition work to their advantage.

All three caterers agree that quality of product and service means not only kashrut and nutrition, but variety and style of presentation, as well as respect for diet consciousness and allergies. Chefs today must be more inventive, Elmaleh says.

Food is both the most important item at your simchah, says Elmaleh, and the most costly, but it should be accompanied by good service. Your caterer should take as much care in assigning the wait staff, as in preparing the food. Insist on quality service regardless of budget.

Be more innovative

Older companies have a longer track record and more experience. On the other hand, says Gorman, a new company may be more receptive to new ideas. Elmaleh and Sugar find that competition is spurring older caterers to be more innovative.

Many synagogue caterers, Sugar says, have operated for generations; they are often family businesses where the children have learnt from the parents. These caterers don't over-book, they have fine silver and other amenities. Moreover, the revenue stays within the community. Using a shul-affiliated caterer at another locale is also fairly reliable, she adds.

An in-house caterer with their own hall, Gorman notes, will have everything available where you need it. This is important, especially in cool weather. In the summer, you can choose your venue more creatively. Weddings, Sugar says, are still mainly in shuls. Bnai mitzvah are more likely to be held in different kinds of venues.

Besides rapport between caterer and client, Gorman values good working relationships with florists, decorators and other professionals at a simchah. This helps your event run smoothly, and encourages more innovation in things like floral design and overall ambience.

Of course, you also want flexibility. This includes dealing with common demands like separate menus for kids and adults, as well as the ability to cater any event from an informal picnic to an elegant garden wedding.

Sugar emphasizes personal attention to detail and advises looking for a caterer who stays at your function until it is over.

She recommends booking weddings six to nine months ahead, or as soon as you make the engagement; bnai mitzvah, two to three years, or 18 months for non-members.

For busy summer dates, says Gorman, book six months ahead, and allow for up to four consultations, depending on your event. Booking two years ahead is not too soon, Elmaleh says, for a simchah as big as a wedding, but don't complete plans for the menu till a month or six weeks before.

PARTY PLANNER

It all begins with an invitation

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Give your guests a glimpse of the party weeks before the actual event.

"An invitation sets the scene," says Renee Cons-Rosenzweig, owner of The Main Event, (638-9373). "When people open that envelope they get a feeling for what is coming," she says.

Cons-Rosenzweig, who sells invitations from over 30 catalogues, says that when people come to see her, they often have no idea what they want.

"First on the agenda is budget. When we get an idea what they can spend, then we proceed."

Flipping through up-to-date catalogues, clients get a feel for the latest trends, she says.

"Popular now are the plastic see-through cards, written in silver and adorned with sparkles. They portray a light, cheerful mood. We are also seeing a lot of different shapes.

"Bar mitzvah invitations tend to be more colorful and trendy, while brides seem to stick to the more traditional. They often choose white or ivory fold-over cards, written in black. Of course, there are also a variety of textures or embossed borders. There is really no end to the creativity that can be put into an invitation."

Marla Kamin, a graphic designer and owner of Elegant Invitations (963-8813), does her own calligraphy and says that it "adds something special to the whole package. When people receive an envelope that is written in an elegant script, they know the type of party they will be attending. Even a plain, white card, if it comes in an envelope lined in fuchsia, can make a statement.

"People can go all out or keep things nice and simple. A fun thing to do is to reflect the theme of the bar mitzvah on the invitation. A sports theme for instance, can have baseballs or logos on the invitation.

"A small budget does not have to stand in the way of a classic invitation," she stresses.

Kamin, who also has a variety of catalogues, says that clients need not stick to one invitation from the book. "We can base our ideas on the book, but take something from one invitation, something else from another, until we have a product with which everyone is happy."

Cons-Rosenzweig suggests that people order their invitations at least three months in advance because "there has to be time allowed for processing. Invitations should go out at least six weeks before the party."

And above all, she says, "when you see a proof, check it, check it, and check it again. If you find something you want to change, you want to find it in the proof."
